THE MILLIONTH TOURIST

Rosetta Pileggi, a 72 year-old resident of Florida, was welcomed last week at Ben Gurion Airport by Tourism Minister Benyamin Elon. Some 1,050,000 tourists visited Israel in 2003, an increase of 22 per cent over last year. In 2000, the year the Palestinians launched the ongoing terror war against Israel, the Jewish state hosted 2.7 million tourists. [Israel Sun photo]

Time is on Israel's side

By EPHRAIM INBAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Commentary

Many Israelis believe time is not on their side in the conflict with the Palestinians and are therefore looking to change the status quo, even unilaterally. And yet, an analysis of Zionist action rather than Zionist rhetoric reveals that playing for time has been one of the mainstays of Israel's national strategy. Founding prime minister David Ben-Gurion understood that Israel was too weak to impose a peace settlement on the Arabs and that it would simply have to wait until the other side would recognize the reality of a Jewish state.

Unfortunately, Palestinians still have pipe dreams of inundating Israel with refugees or winning sovereignty over the Temple Mount. Despite the festive declarations from the Israeli peace camp that we have a negotiating partner, it is obvious that peace cannot be achieved today. This is mainly because of the Palestinians' inability to establish a stable political entity that would be willing to suppress those who oppose Israel's existence.

The CIA has also concluded that before the year 2020, there is no chance of seeing a Palestinian leadership ready to make the concessions that are necessary for a comprehensive agreement. What this means is that Israel has to go on playing for time until the Palestinians are ripe for the kind of peace that will be acceptable to Israel.

Israel's economy

Report: 72 per cent of Israelis earn less than average wage

By RUTH SINAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — According to the annual report of the Adva Center for Equality and Social Justice, 72 per cent of Israelis earn less than the average wage, roughly NIS 7,000 a month. As well, nearly 30 per cent of Israelis earn minimum wage or less, a three per cent increase over 1994.

The report found that the economic situation of Israel's richest 10 per cent improved over the past decade, while the situation of all the other sectors – including, for the first time, the upper middle class – deteriorated.

The report, which is based on figures released by the Central Bureau of Statistics, showed that despite the recession of the past two years, Israel's richest 10 per cent enjoyed improved earnings.

The increase is attributed mainly to a rise in executives' salaries in the business sector. In 1994, top managers earned an average of 30 times the minimum wage. In 2002, their wages were 36 times greater.

While the richest 10 per cent of Israelis' total income increased by 5.6 per cent between 1990 and 2002, the share of the second richest 10 per cent remained stable. The share of the remaining percentiles decreased by 0.4 to 0.8 per cent.

The average monthly income of the richest 10 per cent of households is NIS 41,835, compared to an average income of NIS 3,108 in the poorest 10 per cent of households.

Jewish day schools consider next steps

Liberals repeal tax credit

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Now it's on to Plan B.

The Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS) is regrouping and considering its options in the wake of the Ontario government's passage on Dec. 17 of Bill 2, which repeals the Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC) retroactively to Jan. 1, 2003.

The bill, which also raises tobacco taxes and corporate income taxes – but neither retroactively – was passed by the Liberals by a vote of 64-25.

The government says the measures in Bill 2 will bring in $800 million in additional revenue for 2003 and 2004.

The Jewish members of the legislature, David Caplan and Monte Kwinter, voted for the bill. So did Mario Racco, the MPP for Thornhill, which is one-third Jewish – making it Ontario's most populous Jewish riding – and home to several Jewish day schools.

The association's co-presidents Ira Walfish and Aaron Blumenfeld called Kwinter's support of the bill "extraordinarily disappointing," given that Kwinter broke with his party's ranks last year and voted with the then-Tory government to pass the measure.

Despite vigorous submissions to the government by OAJDS, Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada, each lambasting the Liberals as unfair, punitive and mean-spirited for making the repeal of the tax credit retroactive, the bill was passed, as expected, to make it effective for the tax year that ended Dec. 31.

"It was expected, but it's still shocking," Walfish said. "They did it in the worst way possible. They went back as far as they possibly could."

In its submission last month to the standing committee on finance and economics, the association pointed out if the tax credit is repealed retroactively, parents will be out-of-pocket for a refund they expected under a law that was in place when they made their schooling decision.

Walfish and Blumenfeld estimated that parents will lose up to $1,400 in 2003 and $2,100 in 2004, or between $6,800 and $8,400 in a family of four children.

"It will hurt the most vulnerable people. Most [day school] parents are middle and low-income," said Blumenfeld.

Matti's mother feels betrayed by justice system

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The mother of slain teenager Matti Baranovski says she feels betrayed by the Canadian justice system.

Olga Baranovski believes the two young men who beat her son to death escaped meaningful punishment and are laughing at the justice system, while she has to endure the loss of her son forever.

"It's Gan Eden [the Garden of Eden] for violence," she said. "You can do anything, kill an absolutely innocent child and go free."

Last month, Ontario Superior Court Judge David McCombs sentenced Meir Mariani and William (Lee) Cochrane to 10 years in jail for the beating death of Matti Baranovski. The two men, now 20, were part of a masked gang that beat Matti to death in G. Ross Lord Park in November 1999 when he refused to hand over his cigarettes.

With their four years served in jail awaiting trial counting for double (eight years), Mariani and Cochrane face only two more years in custody.

They will serve their sentences at the Ontario Correctional Institute in Brampton and will be eligible for parole in eight months and for mandatory parole in 16 months. Their jail terms will be followed by three years probation.

Both men were youths when the killing took place, but were elevated to adult court for trial. A third accused, Daniel Weiz, was acquitted of second degree murder charges in July. Mariani and Cochrane were convicted of manslaughter.

– Olga Baranovski

Saying the severity of the offence could have merited a stiffer penalty, McC[illegible]bs said he was optimistic both Mariani and Cochrane coul[illegible]e rehabilitated. McCombs called the attack vicious, senseless and a terrible tragedy. But he said he was impressed by reports of Cochrane's good conduct while in custody and evidence that Mariani can overcome his behavioural problems through treatment.

Cochrane's lawyer, Owen Wigderson, said the jail term announced by McCombs was "a crushing sentence" and was particularly hard on Cochrane's mother.

Steve Fishbayn, who represented Mariani, said the judge applied a "rational and calm approach."

But Olga Baranovski was incensed at the sentence and for its failure to deter future crimes. "The judge has to think not just about [the violent one] but about their victims," she said.

"The violent have all the rights and the victims [none].

"They have to describe to me why my son is dead and I have to cry every day and they will go home."

Baranovski said she does not believe Mariani or Cochrane are remorseful for what they did. "Did you hear them say 'Sorry?' Their lawyers talked," she said.

Baranovski did not attend the hearing and she said none of the Crown attorneys called her in advance to alert her to it. She said she was contacted earlier about making a victim impact statement, but she declined, saying she had lost confidence in the justice system. "I did not want to give the judge the chance to 'laugh' at me again. I'm nothing for them."

She said she was disappointed that the fact Mariani and Cochrane were in the park looking for a Russian group to attack did not play a part in the sentence.

"In the court, nobody said it was discrimination. They should be punished for that. This was racism also."

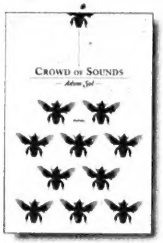
Poet's critical eye

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter



According to poet Adam Sol, the author of a new anthology Crowd of Sounds, poetry is getting a newfound respect.

A teacher of American literature at Sir Wilfred Laurier University and also the author of another poetry collection, Jonah's Promise, Sol says that poetry will never be as popular as fiction, but "with the rise of creative writing programs, there is a lot of good poetry being written."

Sol, 33, says, "Poetry readings are gaining popularity as well. The auditoriums are not full, but new poets come out and people can get a feeling for their work.

"Poems are short, and if the audience stays with you, the reading does its job."

Sol, the husband of Rabbi Yael Splansky of Holy Blossom Temple, and father of 2½ year-old Avishai, was born in New York and grew up in Connecticut. He was writing poetry at an early age, but it was not until he had the "fortune" of taking a class with poet Philip Levine at Tufts University that "I learned it involves more than self-indulgent writing.

"Poetry is a tradition like music or art; there is a craft involved. There is a way of creating original imagery, and there is a way of paying attention to language. The challenge to writing poetry is to take the tradition and do something original with it."

Most poetry starts with musical tones, he says. "Poetry is how language tries to be more musical. I often feel a tone in my head before I know the subject for a poem. The attempt to create the tone leads me to the subject."

He says he often writes poems about emotions that cannot be expressed.

"How do you describe walking around feeling concerned that your child will get hit by a car?

"These are pervasive feelings that we carry around. It's not terror; it is a creepy feeling for which there are no words. I try to write towards that. Any kind of complicated relationship needs a new kind of language."

A theme comes through as he compiles his collections, he says. But, he adds, while "I do not have to be as tight-knit as if I was writing a novel, I hope that each poem speaks to that theme."

The theme of music and danger emerged when he was putting together Crowd of Sounds after Sept. 11.

"There is always the feeling of 'What could I have done, what did I miss?'"

Jewish themes come into his poems a lot, he says.

"In Jonah's Promise, the theme is to choose to remain in the whale's belly, or go out and do something.

"Despite my frustrations with the Jewish community, I will try to be part of it. A marriage may not be perfect, but the choice is to struggle and be part of it or be alone. A long-term commitment to anything is never blissful all the time. We have to find ways to maintain our allegiance."

Post-modern man is not tied to anything, he says, "and that is his ultimate destiny. I am arguing against post-modernism. Things are not perfect, but I will continue to align myself to them."

When he writes his poems, he often writes on impulse. "But I need to then put it away and come back to it with a more critical eye.

"I have to see if its skin has hardened, or if it has turned to mush. That is what makes a poem worth reading. That is how the craft turns emotions into thoughts and allows the reader to travel along with you."

Lord over the rings

From the editor's desk

The movement of time, much like the rhythmic undulation of desert sand, is often visible only at a distance. The beginning of a new calendar year, however, is a neat enough distance from the previous new year to allow us to take note of some of the things that have changed in the inexorable and invisible forward march.

Let us look, for example, at Israel's current security situation, for a great deal has changed from one year ago.

If we use as a template of analysis the existence of three outwardly radiating, concentric rings of danger that Israel faces – outer, middle and inner – it is true to say that Israel's sheer physical security has been enhanced.

The change of regime in Iraq is significant for Israel. One of the major existential threats to the country has been removed. Saddam Hussein was one of the region's main sponsors of terrorism. He was an implacable, vicious foe of the Jewish state. And although the debate concerning his weapons of mass destruction still rages, there is no debate about his willingness to use conventional weapons of mass destruction. The 39 Scud missiles he launched at Israel in 1991 were proof.

If a form of democratic government evolves in Iraq, Saddam's disappearance from the region will have been doubly beneficial to the Jewish state.

In addition, the apparent change in Libyan leader Moammar Ghaddafi's ideological spots is also a boon to Israel. There is no doubt about the existence of his weapons of massive destruction. He admitted to having been actively involved, with the participation of North Korea and Iran, in the development of a sinister arsenal that included chemical, biological and nuclear arms.

If indeed the Libyan ruler has decided to switch sides, as it were, an existential threat from the southwest has now also been removed from the outer ring.

But despite these positive changes in the outer ring, existential threats do remain there. Let us not gainsay the fact.

Iran heads the list. The mullahs who rule Iran are in league with pan-Islamic terrorists – Al Qaeda, Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad, Hamas and other variations on the same murderous theme that spring up from time to time – to try to destroy Israel.

Their resources and their fanaticism are a deadly combination that Israel dare not underestimate.

The threat from the middle ring of dangers – countries bordering Israel – may also have diminished from a year ago.

Relations with the government of Egypt and Jordan are stable, if not warm. Indeed, there has been a great deal more diplomatic and other contact with Egypt of late. As long as the regimes are not toppled by Islamic brotherhoods, or other like-minded subversives, we can expect bilateral relations with Israel to slowly improve.

Lebanon, however, is still problematic for it is under the boot of Syria, with some 25,000 of its troops there, and the heel of Iran, which controls Hezbollah. Thus, it has no independence of policy or of movement in relation to Israel. And the two regimes do not always operate in sync. Indeed, they may be increasingly out of step with each other in the coming months.

No sooner had the dour Syrian dictator uttered his carefully calibrated ambiguities regarding peace with Israel than western governments and media, including Israeli, were urging Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to pursue the Syrian "gesture."

Thus, this past weekend, the matter was placed on the agenda of the weekly meeting of the Israeli cabinet. Sharon told the cabinet that if negotiations were to resume with Syria, they would start from scratch. They would not pick up where they had left off in 2000 with former prime minister Ehud Barak.

"We have serious problems with Syria," Sharon told his cabinet. "They extend patronage to Palestinian terror, they allow terrorist training camps to exist, they send terrorists off to Israel. They must get rid of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, expel Hezbollah from south Lebanon and enable the Lebanese army to deploy along the border, dismantle the missile system along the northern border and give us information on our missing men and hostages."

As for the inner ring of danger, namely, the threat from the Palestinians in the disputed territories, the situation, alas, is deteriorating. I say this even though the security wall has proven effective in reducing the number of suicide bombings.

Without a change of regime in the Palestinian Authority, there is no hope that the idea of reconciliation and peaceful co-existence with the Jewish state can take root in Palestinian society. And without such a notion firmly and sincerely embedded in the hearts of the parents, teachers, political leaders and religious authorities raising the next generation, there will never be full security for Israel. There may be a modus vivendi, but not peace.

The threat from the Palestinians, though painful, is not a mortal threat to the physical existence of the state. It is however, a demographic threat to the existence of a Jewish state.

Thus, though its security situation has improved since one year ago, Israel must still be lord over the rings of danger.

—MBD

Finta case changed war crimes prosecution

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Imre Finta, a former captain in the Hungarian gendarmerie who was charged with Nazi-era war crimes, died recently at age 90.

Finta faced four counts including robbery, unlawful confinement, kidnapping and manslaughter in connection with the forced deportation of 8,617 Hungarian Jews from the provincial town of Szeged. Evidence at his trial indicated that after being confined in an open-air brickyard, the Jews were loaded onto sealed trains in inhumane conditions to be sent to Auschwitz or to forced labour in Nazi-occupied Europe. Many died en route.

A jury acquitted Finta of all charges, and on March 24, 1994, in a 4-3 decision, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the acquittal. Legal scholars said the High Court's decision set conditions for conviction so high that it made it virtually impossible to successfully prosecute Nazi war criminals in this country.

The court ruled that an accused must not only be shown to have the requisite mens rea (state of mind) to intend a criminal act, such as murder or kidnapping, but must also realize the act is part of a war crime. The court also allowed an accused to escape responsibility if he or she was merely following orders.

The Finta trial came a few years after the federal government amended the Criminal Code to give Canadian courts jurisdiction to try alleged Nazi war criminals. That move was one of several recommendations in the 1986 Deschenes commission report on bringing Nazi criminals to justice.

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said the court's decision in the Finta case in effect put an end to war crimes prosecutions in Canada.

"Instead, the more cumbersome, time-consuming and highly inefficient process of denaturalization and deportation was instituted in Canada," he stated.

"While numerous individuals have been stripped of their citizenship, none have been forcibly removed. All are still in Canada, either in various stages of appeal or other litigation, or awaiting cabinet's order of removal. Some have been waiting for years."

Ed Morgan, a professor of law and Ontario regional chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, said "the significance [of the Finta case] was that our Canadian prosecutorial efforts are almost as dead as he is."

Had the Supreme Court adopted the position set out in a minority decision by Ontario Court of Appeal chief justice Charles Dubin, criminal prosecutions may well have continued, Morgan said. Dubin argued the Crown should only have to show objectively that the acts were war crimes, not that the defendant knew they were.

Two years ago, the Criminal Code was amended to remove the defence of following orders. But the government long ago abandoned criminal prosecutions and focused instead on the civil remedy of stripping suspects of citizenship and deporting them, Morgan said.

What's more, the Supreme Court decision resonated beyond Nazi-era war crimes to modern ones. "The same test that were articulated in Finta would apply to modern day war criminals," he said. "It really had a chilling effect."

Finta immigrated to Canada in 1951, three years after a Hungarian tribunal convicted him in absentia of "crimes against the people." He became a Canadian citizen in 1956. For many years, he operated a Hungarian restaurant on Bloor Street, a short walk from the Jewish Community Centre at Bloor and Spadina Avenue.

Lodzer Congregation hosts cantorial concert

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

The Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation recently celebrated its 50th anniversary by hosting the Lights of Chazzanut Cantorial Concert, where Yiddish, Hebrew and Broadway songs were performed.

Cantors Shneur Bielak of Agudath Israel in Ottawa, Sidney Dworkin of Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal, Ben Silverberg of Shaar Shalom in Thornhill and the Lodzer's David Edwards, along with 11-year-old singer Jakie Young, sang a diverse set, from the Broadway tune Bring Him Home to the Yiddish folk song A Zemerl.

"This is not a typical cantorial concert," said Jeff Shabes, chair of the concert committee, noting this was the first such concert ever held at the shul.

The cantors came up with the idea of singing traditional and modern age music, "to try and bring in people of all ages," Shabes said.

With nearly 500 people on hand, from children to seniors, the performance appeared to have met that goal.

"It's a nice mix of ages, which is pretty unusual," said Frumie Silver, who attended the concert with her mother-in-law Gertrude Silver.

"I feel like we are celebrating who we are as Jewish people. It gives me a lot of strength."

Mazal Satov brought her 11-year-old daughter Talia to the concert because "she likes Jewish music."

"I also like old music, classical music," Talia said.

Edwards, who had personally approached all the sponsors and recruited the performers, encouraged the audience to participate right from the start by clapping his hands as he sang Avinu She-bashamayim.

The cantors also sang an assortment of Chanukah medleys, during which Dworkin added some comedy to the performance by altering the words of The Twelve Days of Christmas to incorporate Chanukah themes.

Shabes noted that in addition to celebrating the congregation's jubilee, the concert organizers wanted to promote the synagogue.

"We consider the Lodzer Centre to be a best-kept secret and we were looking for a way to get the shul better known," he said.

The Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation was founded by Polish immigrants from Lodz and was the first synagogue in North America to include the word Holocaust in its name.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The newly appointed co-director of the Toronto International Film Festival, Noah Cowan, describes himself as a "film mad" cinephile.

Noah Cowan

Cowan, who settles into his job this week following a brief career as a film distributor in New York City, has been associated with the festival, on and off, for more than two decades.

In 1981 when he was still a teenager, he sold tickets in the box office.

Now 36, Cowan joined the festival in 1989 as a programmer after graduating from McGill University with a major in philosophy.

He co-founded the Midnight Madness program, and from 1997 to 1999, he was associate director of programming.

Asked if he had deliberately planned his ascent to the top tier of festival management, he laughed. "I wish I had the capacity for such a devious master plan."

Cowan, who was most recently founder and co-president of Cowboy Pictures and president and managing partner of Code Red Films, will be jointly responsible for the festival's overall programming and administration.

He will work in close collaboration with Piers Handling, director and chief executive officer of the Toronto International Festival Group, and Michele Maheux, the festival's managing director.

A former freelance journalist whose stories have been published in The Globe and Mail and Moving Pictures International, Cowan has no immediate plans for the festival.

"I have an amazing team of programmers seeking the finest cinema there is, and I want to listen to them before I come up with ideas."

Cowan, however, intends to maintain the festival's high standards and influence. "It does what it does extremely well," he said.

In addition, Cowan wants to preserve its reputation as a people's festival.

"From my perspective, the European and American festivals are quite different," he explained in an interview. "We're an absolutely public festival. Festivals like Cannes cater almost entirely to the industry."

For the first three years in his new position, Cowan will work closely with Handling, a colleague and friend whom he met in the mid-1980s.

When Cowan was a programmer, curating such specials as "India Now!" and "New Beat of Japan," he saw anywhere from 500 to 1,000 movies a year.

"My tastes are very broad. I find merit in films ranging from Hollywood classics to weird little films from Kazakhstan."

Cowan left the festival in 2001 to devote more attention to Cowboy Pictures, a film distribution company he co-founded in 1999. It specialized in art house movies and documentaries.

"I saw all these good movies at the festival and they went away, never seeing the light of day. It was a source of frustration. That's why I went into the distribution end of the business."

With Cowan at its helm, Cowboy released a number of prize-winning films, including Promises and The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg.

Promises, by B.Z. Goldberg, Justine Shapiro and Carlos Bolado, turns on seven Israeli and Palestinian youths who discuss war and peace and thus cast an illuminating light on the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg, directed by Aviva Kempner, is a profile of one of America's greatest Jewish baseball stars. It was very successful financially.

Cowan, who has also been an actor, hails from an artistic Toronto family. "I was exposed to the arts from an early age," he recalled.

His father, Edgar, was publisher of Saturday Night magazine and started the now-defunct C Channel.

His mother, Nuala, an actress, appeared in Canadian films running the gamut from The Brood to The Silent Partner.

The cruel, pitiful wages of hate

How tragic for the poor, suffering people of Iran that the theocratic despots who rule their country could not set aside their irrational hatred of Jews and the Jewish state for even one week. Israel immediately offered to help the Islamic Republic in the rescue and recovery of the victims of the horrific earthquake that demolished the city of Bam last week and buried and killed thousands of Iranians in the suffocating, crushing rubble of mud, brick and cleaved earth.

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom conveyed the following message. "The Israeli people and government send their condolences to the Iranian people. The government and people of Israel feel the pain of this human tragedy facing the Iranian people, and despite all the differences of opinion, at these moments a mobilization of the entire international community is needed to help the injured and the families of the victims."

Few countries, if any, have better medical emergency response teams than Israel, and few could have come to Iran's aid as quickly.

In 1999, Israeli sent a 250-person medical team, as well as other rescue personnel, to Turkey following a massive earthquake that killed more than 15,000 people. In 2001, Israel dispatched a field hospital and some 150 people to India to assist in rescue and medical efforts after an earthquake that killed some 20,000 people in Bhuj.

Yet, the government of Iran preferred to allow its own people to suffer and, very likely, to die, rather than accept the hand outstretched toward it from Israel. Jahanbakhsh Khanjani, a spokesperson for Iran's interior ministry, said, "The Islamic Republic of Iran accepts all kinds of humanitarian aid from all countries and international organizations, with the exception of the Zionist regime."

How sadly heartbreaking for the victims, their bones crushed and their lungs choked by dust and noxious air. They were trapped in hell by the earthquake and by their own government.

But how terribly despicable of Iran's leaders. It is an irrelevant defence on their part that many other countries had also offered assistance and that they subsequently received all manner of aid.

Every moment, every hour of immediate rescue effort was vital to pull out as many people as possible from the devastation. Every set of experienced hands was necessary to save the lives that could be saved. Nor was any humanitarian aid unneeded by the dazed, disbelieving survivors.

But this pattern of irrational hatred passing itself off as governance is not a new one in the Middle East.

We send our condolences to the grieving families whose lives have been shattered and forever altered. Such are the cruel, pitiful wages of hatred, though, that the price is always paid by the innocent before it is paid by the malevolent.

Geneva Accord Deceptions

Paul Michaels' article on the Geneva accord ("Don't dismiss the Geneva dissenters," The CJN, Dec. 18) is misleading. It is not at all the case, as he claimed, that most of the media attention given to the agreement has been positive. More significantly, Michaels did not expose the depth and detail of criticism that has come from highly respected commentators on both the left and the right.

The accord has received critical analysis from Hillel Halkin, Jeff Jacoby, Shlomo Avineri, Charles Krauthammer, David Meir-Levi, Natan Sharansky and many others.

For example, Avineri, a professor at Hebrew University who can hardly be accused of having a right-wing bias, writes that the initiators of the Geneva document – former Israeli justice minister Yossi Beilin and former Palestinian information minister Yasser Abed Rabbo – have brazenly lied to the public. He then offers a few examples of their deceptions:

• The initiators present themselves as independent political and intellectual figures from both sides. Not true. This is a document, Avineri says, that comes from the opposition in Israel and the Palestinian ruling establishment.

• The initiators said the accord contains Palestinian recognition of the State of Israel as "the state of the Jewish people." Not true. Nothing in the document explicitly indicates such recognition, nor does the word Jew appear in the document in any context. Furthermore, Avineri says, the Palestinian signators do not include anyone who believes there is a "Jewish people."

• The initiators said the Palestinians have waived the right of return. Not true. What the accord does say is that UN Resolution 194 of 1948 and other resolutions shall be the basis for the solution of the refugee problem. Resolution 194 determines that refugees shall return to their former places of residence. As the Arabs see it, 194 is the basis of the international legitimacy of the right of return.

• The initiators said most of the Israeli settlers would remain where they are. Not true. What the document does indicate is that most of settlers in Gaza and the West Bank would be evacuated.

There's more – much more – of significance, but there's enough here to show that this agreement is a dangerous, deceptive piece of work. I would remind readers that Beilin is the architect of the disastrous Oslo Accords that brought war, not peace, to Israel, and that with this latest undertaking, he is continuing that onslaught.

I have been waiting and hoping, in vain, for the left to come to terms with reality and to stop living by ideological wish fulfilment, but their initiation and support for this illegitimate agreement tells me that I'd better not hold my breath.

Conservative Jewish News?

A good percentage of Israelis support the Geneva Accord. Alongside them are a plurality of North American and European Jews, and even high-level members of Israel's military and intelligence community. For one reason or another, this fantastic opportunity for peace seems to elude The Canadian Jewish News. One would not have to look very far to find unbridled anti-Geneva incitement in the pages of The CJN.

To put it bluntly, Israel is surely an important issue to the plurality of Canadian Jews, but we do not all have the same views on Israel. To offer a perspective that is arguably to the right of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon does a disservice. Perhaps the paper's name should be changed to the Conservative Jewish News. The initials would stay the same, and there would be at least some truth in advertising.

Urges philanthropy with humility

It is a sad day in Jewish philanthropy when a Jewish community centre feels that the name of a funding donor should be bigger than the cause itself. I am disheartened by the size of the donor's name on the recently re-branded Jewish community centre at Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue. I have no issues with trading money for naming rights in a highly competitive era in which sponsorship dollars and philanthropy make a huge difference in determining the health of a venue. However, this example is a step backward in promoting the vitality of the Jewish community. I challenge anyone to drive by and determine the building's raison d'etre. Where is the humility?

Solace from moderate Muslim

The story of Sarah Nasser, ("Muslim student criticized for supporting Israel," The CJN, Dec. 18) a Muslim university student who has been ostracized because she spoke out in support of Israel's right to exist, is one of both sadness and optimism.

It is a tremendous shame that Nasser, in making a moderate and respectable statement, is humiliated by her fellow Muslims. It is a shame that when Jews and Israelis support a Palestinian state, they are applauded, while Arabs who refuse to believe that Israel is the "little Satan" are considered to be inferior to their fundamentalist contemporaries.

However, we as supporters of Israel must take solace in the fact that brave individuals such as Nasser do exist, and we should embrace their efforts to bring mutual respect and understanding.

A peacenik's dissenting view on the Geneva Accord

By HOWARD ADELMAN

Many committed Zionist liberals and doves see promise in the Geneva Accord. Exasperation with military responses to terrorism that seem to lead nowhere, rage at Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's hypocritical policies on the settlements, opposition to the security wall that goes deep into the West Bank, and fear of a Palestinian demographic majority in the land between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea can all make one desperate to reach a peace agreement. But that frustration, fury and fear should not make one blind to the content of that agreement.

The Geneva Accord, which was signed last month by former Israeli justice minister Yossi Beilin and former Palestinian information minister Yasser Abed Rabbo and calls for an Israeli withdrawal from almost all the land occupied by Israel in the 1967 war, is path-breaking – not in a virtuous way, but because it creates potholes on the road to peace.

Explicit recognition of Israel as the "homeland of the Jewish people" – one of the concessions the Palestinians must make under the accord – is an empty victory bought at the cost of selling out Israeli sovereignty. The accord is a step backward in the search for a solution to the Palestinian refugee problem – the plan's central motif and the issue that destroyed the Taba agreements in 2000 and 2001, when Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat insisted that peace would not be possible unless Israel guaranteed a Palestinian "right of return" and compensation for lost property and 5½ decades of suffering by Palestinian refugees.

Amos Oz, the Israeli author who was part of the Geneva Accord's negotiating team, told an audience at Princeton University on Nov. 10 that the Palestinian refugee issue was more urgent than the issue of borders, settlements or holy sites. However, the plan undercuts the progress to date on Palestinian refugees by ignoring the accomplishments, however limited, of the so-called "Ottawa process" that Canada led in the 1990s while it was the gavel holder of the multilateral Refugee Working Group.

Most importantly, the Geneva Accord is based on a false belief held by many dovish Palestinians and some dovish supporters of Israel that the dispossession was entirely premeditated and executed by the Zionists, and so Israel is made to accept sole moral responsibility for the plight of the Palestinian refugees. In fact, whatever the size of the minority of Palestinian Arabs forced from their homes, most fled to get out of the way of a war initiated and perpetrated by Arab states against the majority will of the United Nations.

If the accord is so favourable to the Palestinians, why is Fatah – the backbone of Arafat's Palestinian Authority – leading the growing opposition to this unofficial agreement and labelling it a "surrender document," even though the Palestinian negotiators participated with Arafat's consent? Is it because the Geneva Accord replaces the idea of "right" with "choice," despite the fact there is no "right of return" mentioned in UN Resolution 194 of 1948, the document often cited as the source of this "right"?

(On refugees, Resolution 194 "[r]esolves that the refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbours should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return and for loss of or damage to property which, under principles of international law or in equity, should be made good by the Governments or authorities responsible; Instructs [a UN] Conciliation Commission to facilitate the repatriation, resettlement and economic and social rehabilitation of the refugees and the payment of compensation, and to maintain close relations with the Director of the United Nations Relief for Palestine Refugees and, through him, with the appropriate organs and agencies of the United Nations.")

The Geneva Accord sells out "the right of return" as a right. Choice of permanent place of residence for refugees under the accord is subject to a number of restrictions that infuriate most Palestinian refugees, for it gives the final determination of return to Israel to an international trustee authority and does not even grant Palestinians a right to return to Palestine itself, nor compensation if they lost property.

On the other hand, Arafat believes in winning concession after concession. The accord suits his negotiating strategy while providing for payment of "compensation" as a "lump sum" to Palestine by Israel.

But what does the accord say that is so unfavourable to Israel that led Arafat to give it even qualified support?

As the basis for the refugee numbers, the plan takes the registration of the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA), which enlarged the actual number of Palestinian refugees by almost one-third.

The total compensation for loss of property, to be paid by Israel alone, does not allow Israel to take part in determining the amount. Instead, the total lump sum is to be determined by a panel of experts based on valuation at the time of displacement, enhanced by an annual economic multiplier, less any value of properties in settlements transferred to the future Palestinian state, but with the addition of an assessment for damages caused by the settlements. More importantly, compensation is not to be prejudiced by where refugees end up, contrary to the provisions of UN Resolution 194.

Most importantly, Israel is also required to contribute to a "refugeehood" fund. While UNRWA defines Palestine refugees based on their economic status, the Journal of Refugee Studies (in March 2002) says refugeehood in international law is a "product of persecution." But the Geneva Accord grants "refugeehood" to Palestinian refugees using the UNWRA definition, rather than one that defines it as the result of displacement and flight during wartime. Responsibility for their situation is attributed to Israel alone.

The Geneva Accord also contains no provision to compensate the 750,000 Jews forced to flee Arab countries because of pogroms surrounding Israel's creation in 1948. And yet the plan provides compensation to the Arab countries that received Palestinian refugees. Finally, there is no recognition of the fact the original definition of the refugees in UN Resolution 194 included the 35,000 Jews who fled from the West Bank. The accord only talks about "Palestinian" refugees, not about "Palestine" refugees, which included Jews as well as Arabs. Jews are given no opportunity to return or even stay in the West Bank. The Israeli government is obliged to help make the West Bank and Gaza judenrein.

What about choices for resettlement? The Geneva Accord offers five options: • refugees can stay or return to the state of Palestine;
• they can relocate in territory transferred to Palestine by Israel;
• they can choose to emigrate to third countries;
• they can remain in their host countries; or
• they can return to the State of Israel.

An international commission is given full and exclusive responsibility for overseeing and managing all aspects of refugee resettlement, including the authority to render binding decisions in case of disputes. However, in each of the first four options, the choice is subject to the sovereign authority of the states in which the refugees wish to take up permanent residence, including the full sovereign authority of a future Palestinian state. Only Israel is denied the full sovereign authority to make a decision on how many and which refugees can settle in Israel, as only it is required to consider the average number of refugees to be resettled in third countries when submitting a base number to the commission.

If the refugee clauses are central to the debate surrounding the Geneva Accord, they undermine rather than complement progress to peace. Why? Because they deepen the fissures on Israel's left and convince the vast majority of Jews – not just Israelis – that doves, in desperation to get an agreement, will sell their birthright and Israel's interests for a string of beads. Further, the Geneva Accord supports the conviction that doves cannot even read the documents they themselves support.

My colleague, Prof. Naomi Chazan, writing in the Jerusalem Post (Oct. 16), says the accord upsets Sharon's "working premise that no political negotiations with the Palestinians are possible today," but she only proves that negotiations which sell out Israel's fundamental principles are possible – an equally false premise. She believes the accord guarantees there will be "no Palestinian return to Israel," and that "extraordinary individual humanitarian cases will be settled only by agreement."

In fact, the accord provides for return, not on the basis of humanitarian family reunification, but by formula, the control of which is taken out of the hands of the sovereign State of Israel.

I think the authors and supporters of the Geneva Accord are right to be genuinely concerned about Palestinian refugees, as well as the desperation and suffering of the Palestinians in general. More importantly, they are right to push not for victor's justice, but for generosity on the part of the victor who, in a century-long war, has gained ownership of most of the land between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea. I do not regard them as subversive of Israel. I regard them as subversive of the prospect of peace, however well-intended they may be. I do not question their morals, merely their judgment. They are committed democrats, but they have undermined the cause of democracy and peace in the Middle East.

Howard Adelman is a professor emeritus of philosophy at York University and the founding director of the Centre for Refugee Studies.

Is this deal for real?

If you are planning to examine the text of the Geneva Accord, be sure you are alert and well-rested. It is a ponderous read, full of detail and nuanced language that seems only to add clutter to an already complicated template for peace talks.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Not surprisingly, the document has ignited debate from across the political spectrum. Among its supporters, the accord has been portrayed as a comprehensive set of principles that ought to satisfy the aspirations of both Israelis and Palestinians. By others, the document has been denounced as "irresponsible freelance diplomacy," a "sell-out" and a "delusion."

But like it or hate it, what we have now is yet another agreement to throw into a hopper already filling with other deals of relatively recent vintage. Since none of these has so far brought any semblance of peace to the region, how likely is it that this particular formula, which is based in large part on the fundamentals of its predecessors, will have any greater chance of success?

On the one hand, it is perhaps too early to completely dismiss this new initiative. On the other, it might already be too late to seriously consider it as an adequate blueprint for a sustainable peace process.

One very obvious misgiving is that the accord's Israeli negotiators are far too removed from government, while their Palestinian counterparts are far too close to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat. More substantively, however, there are ambiguities in the accord itself that raise serious concerns about its intrinsic merit and the potential consequences of its implementation. Perhaps the two most important of these relate to the status and proposed destinations of Palestinian refugees, and whether or not the recognition of Israel as a Jewish state will be accepted as absolute and non-negotiable. Until such concerns are properly addressed, the intentions of the accord will continue to evoke doubts and suspicions – on both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian divide.

As was to be expected, many world leaders have been only too happy to endorse this virtual peace deal. By contrast, Israel's leadership has forever been, and will no doubt continue to be, weary of such initiatives. The devil, to quote the old cliché, is in the details, and there is still much in the details of the accord that requires more careful scrutiny.

But the real question is whether such scrutiny will even be necessary. After all, given current precedents, there may yet be another peace proposal on the table before the ink has even dried on this one. And what, by the way, has happened to the Quartet-sponsored "road map" for peace that is still supposed to be the only official basis for ongoing negotiations?

In praise of Safta Marcelle

She's short but stands tall. She speaks softly but people listen. Her Hebrew is good but her Arabic is better. She is a passionate Jerusalemite but nostalgic about her native land. She's modest but her saga is not.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

With a sparkle in her eyes and a smile to match, she exudes warmth, wisdom and dignity. To me she is one of the greats I've met in Israel, emblematic of the fortitude that has built and helped sustain this country. Best of all, she's my wife's safta.

Growing up in Canada, I never had a safta (Israeli-style grandmother). When I was born, three of my four grandparents had already died. My father's Russian-born mother, my only surviving grandparent, was a distant figure I knew as Bubbie.

In my wife's extended family in Israel, Marcelle Ballas is affectionately known to her 29 grandchildren, and 15 great-grandchildren as Safta Marcelle or more commonly Safta. They love her madly. To Safta's eight children and their spouses, she's Ima. To me, she's Safta and so much more, including my children's great-grandmother.

Safta was born in Iraq in the early 1920s. She's not sure exactly when because she never got a birth certificate. She is sure that in 1950, she left Baghdad with her husband and four children as part of a major airlift of Iraqi Jews to Israel.

Despite her large family, Safta was allowed to take only a few small suitcases. She spoke only Arabic and was pregnant with her fifth child. Like most of the 130,000 Iraqi Jews brought to Israel between 1949 and 1952, Safta arrived bewildered and unsure of the future.

It's hard today to picture the terrible adversity new immigrants faced in the early years of the state. For their first four months, Safta and her family lived in a tent in an immigrant transit camp in Pardess Hanna. Many nights, Safta broke down in tears and longed to be back in Baghdad. Finally, her younger sister brought Safta's family to Jerusalem, where the two families lived for the next half-year in a one-room apartment.

With next to no money, a few dozen words of Hebrew and a largely absent husband, Safta then moved her family into an abandoned, decrepit apartment across town with two tiny, windowless rooms. That was home for more than a decade, during which Safta single-handedly raised five daughters and three sons. Her husband was no longer in the picture. What Safta could not provide for her children in material comfort, she compensated for with boundless love and devotion.

Today, Safta has reason to be proud. Her eight children have all made a success of their lives. One is a lawyer, two are building developers, one's a real estate agent, another is a senior Treasury official and still another a school principal. One of her daughters, Dalia Itzik, is a former cabinet minister and deputy mayor of Jerusalem and currently a Knesset member. Many tout her as a possible future prime ministerial candidate.

All eight are married, have beautiful families, live in Jerusalem and remain tightly attached to each other and to Safta. On most Saturday afternoons, they congregate in her apartment.

"I'm thankful to Israel because of how my children developed and the life they have now," says Safta. "In the early years, life here was extremely difficult. It was not what they promised… before we left Iraq."

Always compassionate, Safta never seems to sit in judgment. That applies to Israeli-Arab relations, too.

"I don't know if there will be peace here, but I pray for it," Safta says. "I hope things will work out for Israel, that Jews and Arabs will be able to live together, even to like each other. Just as it was in Iraq. Most of the Arabs there were good to the Jews."

Regarding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Safta refuses to point a finger. "I don't know who's more responsible for the problem, us or them. It's hard for me to judge their grievances. I know many Israelis are bitter about them. I'm not. I'm only bitter about those, whether they be Arab or Jew, who do bad unto others. Both sides have to sit together, quietly, and deal with this dispute."

A chance to change the agenda

The actions of the United Nations in leading the campaign to demonize Israel have also led to the organization's decline in prestige and influence. Recently, the process accelerated with the General Assembly decision to refer Israel's construction of a security barrier to the International Court of Justice (ICJ).

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The 90 nations who voted for this resolution, as well as the 74 who abandoned any claims to morality by abstaining, have never condemned the Palestinian terror campaign that has murdered murdered 900 Israelis in the past three years, and injured thousands more. But, in yet another sign of the power of political correctness, Israel's actions to defend itself and its civilian population from attack have been singled out.

In turning to the ICJ, the Arab regimes were aware of the fact there is little chance Israel will get a fair trial. Many of the ICJ judges are appointed with the backing of dictators and anti-democratic political leaders. As with other international organizations, the deck has been stacked against Israel long before any evidence is taken. In this environment, Israel's best strategy might be to boycott this "kangaroo court."

But there is a different approach, based on precisely the opposite strategy. While the judges may be stacked against Israel, the public proceedings may also provide an opportunity for Israel to demonstrate the core morality of its case. From this perspective, a high-profile presentation of the history of Palestinian and Arab rejectionism, beginning in 1947 and continuing to this day, could be an important opportunity.

But to pull this off, instead of a meek defense of Israeli policy, including the construction of the defensive barrier against terrorism, the legal team would have to change the agenda and take the offensive. This high-risk but high-payoff strategy would require making convincing arguments in two dimensions – conceptual and substantive.

In terms of the concept, the Israeli team would need to demonstrate that unilateral separation is necessary to protect lives, and that there is no other realistic way of preventing terrorism. This is the easy part, based on evidence that efforts to negotiate a compromise solution failed repeatedly due to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's policies and his unchanging determination to use terror to destroy Israel.

There is plenty of material, including testimony from Palestinian officials, to show that the "Oslo peace process" was used to prepare for terrorism and violence, and that no sincere or serious effort was made to reach a "permanent status agreement" at Camp David in July 2000. As a recent CIA report concluded, the chances for negotiation of compromise agreements that will actually be honoured by the Palestinian side are minuscule in the next 20 years (the "Geneva Accord" notwithstanding).

On this basis, the logic of unilateral separation to protect Israeli cities is overwhelming. The alternative of maintaining the status quo would sentence hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of additional Israelis to death from terror attacks. From this perspective, unilateral separation is not only logical, but morally and legally necessary.

After making this conceptual argument, the case will move to the substance, and whether Israel is violating international law by not building the separation barrier along the "Green Line". Here, the Israeli team will need to show the armistice line that was drawn in 1949, following the Arab invasion, and held until the 1967 war, lacks the status of an international boundary and is not, therefore, sacrosanct.

In addition, the history of the 1967 war will need to be presented, including the fact the Israeli capture of the "occupied territories" was an appropriate response to Arab preparations to drive the Jews into the sea. Under international law, territory gained in a defensive war has an entirely different status than the ill-gotten gains of an aggressive one.

For the proponents of an activist strategy before the UN and the ICJ, this represents an opportunity to make up for more than 30 years of meek defensiveness and apologetics that have left Israel politically weak and isolated.

The question is whether the case can be made strongly enough, and whether "international public opinion" is willing to listen.

Jewish studies in China are growing

Just ask Zhou Guo Jian, the associate dean of the Center of Jewish Studies Shanghai (CJSS), the oldest institution of its kind in China.

"It's definitely a growing trend," he said in an interview.

Before the creation of the centre in 1988, Jewish studies attracted the attention of some 20 Chinese scholars, including Pan Guang, Zhou's teacher, mentor and boss.

Sheldon Kirshner in Shanghai

But 15 years on, the field concentrates the minds of about 50 academics throughout China.

And within a decade, the figure is expected to double, according to Zhou, a 48-year-old scholar who segued into Jewish studies by way of his fascination with, and expertise in, the Middle East.

But as he noted, it would be misleading to leave the impression that Jewish studies are something of a novelty in China.

It really all began around the mid-19th century, when Western Christian missionaries and scholars "discovered" the long, uninterrupted presence of Jews in the southwestern city of Kaifeng, which was settled by Jewish traders from Iran, India and Afghanistan about 1,000 years ago.

The flow of Middle Eastern, British and Russian Jews into China from the 1840s onward prompted notable Chinese scholars, such as Ye Han, Chen Yuan, Wu Han and Pan Guangdan, to enter the field in the late 1890s.

They were mainly interested in the earliest Jewish penetrations into China and the formation and dissolution of the paradigmatic Kaifeng community.

After World War II, Chinese scholarship focused on Shanghai and the European Jewish refugee population it supported in the 1930s and 1940s. But due to political constraints, Jewish studies stagnated after 1949.

China's turn toward the West in the 1980s, a reflection of its desire to modernize its economy, and China's establishment of formal diplomatic relations with Israel in 1992, a move designed to raise its profile in the international arena and in Mideast diplomacy, energized Jewish studies.

It was against this backdrop that the Centre of Jewish Studies Shanghai (CJSS) was born.

Since then, Jewish studies centres have cropped up at, among other places, Nanjing University, Henan University and the Hei Longjiang Academy of Social Sciences, disclosed Zhou, who recently guided a Canadian delegation around Shanghai.

But CJSS, an arm of the Shanghai Academy of Social Sciences, is still an influential research institution in China.

In recent years, CJSS has published a plethora of books and albums – The Jews in China, The Jews in Shanghai, Shanghai Jews Since 1840, The Revitalization of the Jewish People and Jewish Civilization.

CJSS has also organized a photographic exhibit of the Jewish experience in Shanghai, sponsored conferences on Israel and Jews in China, offered Hebrew language classes to adults and children and lent assistance to foreign filmmakers who have produced documentaries about the Jews of China. (These include Yossi Turisky's Chinese Jews on the Banks of the Yellow River, Steven Calcote's and Jonathan Shulman's Minyan in Kaifeng, Joan Grossman's and Paul Rosdy's The Port of Last Resort: Zuflucht in Shanghai and Karen Shopsowitz's A Place To Save Your Life: The Story of the Jewish Refugee Community of Shanghai, China.)

This year, CJSS plans to publish two more books – on Shanghai and on Jews in modern China – and to mount an exhibition on Jakob Rosenfeld. A German Jewish doctor who survived the rigours of Dachau and Buchenwald, he found refuge in Shanghai in 1939 and, subsequently, was a general in Mao Zedong's People's Liberation Army.

Later this year, CJSS is planning to host an international conference on Asian Jewish communities.

CJSS' library of Judaica consists of some 1,000 volumes, about 50 of which are in Chinese. Its books, some of which were donated by Canadians and Americans, run the gamut from Irving Howe's World of Our Fathers and Robert Gamzey's Miracle of Israel to David Bankier's Probing the Depths of German Anti-Semitism and The Jews in Canada, edited by Robert Brym, William Shaffir and Morton Weinfeld.

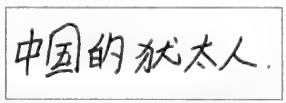
Back copies of the Jerusalem Report and the Jerusalem Post are also on the shelves, as are conjoined Israeli and Chinese plastic flags and a framed photograph of former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and his wife, Leah, during their visit to Shanghai in October 1993.

Apart from Rabin, a procession of Israeli dignitaries, from former presidents Chaim Herzog and Ezer Weizman to former prime ministers Benjamin Netanyahu and Shimon Peres, has passed through CJSS.



"Jews in China," as rendered in Chinese characters by Jasty Chang

To no one's surprise, CJSS played a role in the formation of diplomatic ties between China and Israel.

"Israeli delegations and scholars visited our centre before 1992," said Zhou, who is also deputy director of the Center of Middle East Studies in the Shanghai Academy of Social Sciences.

(Zhou was originally a specialist in Arabic, a skill that took him to Iraq and Yemen as an interpreter for Chinese companies based in those countries. While working in the port of Aden, Zhou learned about Jewish merchants who had reached China via the Silk Road centuries ago.)

CJSS has formed strong links with Hebrew University and Tel Aviv University, and every year the centre sends one or two scholars to Israel.

Wang Jian, the CJSS' 38-year-old deputy dean and director of the Center for Middle East Studies at the Shanghai Academy of Social Sciences, spent a year at Hebrew University, starting in October 2001.

In Jerusalem, Wang – an expert in Shanghai and Zionism in modern China – collected archival material and interviewed ex-Jewish residents of China for a book about Shanghai he is now in the process of writing.

He admitted he had preconceptions of Israel prior to visiting the Jewish state. "Israel is a very advanced country," he said. "Before, I did not think so."

He was treated royally in Israel. "The Jewish people are very kind to Chinese people. They know we helped them during World War II."

CJSS widens the circle of Jewish scholarship in China by accepting two new students per year. Wang Shuming, a former history teacher and one of Pan Guang's students, began his new career three years ago. His main interests are the Arab-Israeli conflict and Israel's high-tech sector and education system.

"The Jews," he said somewhat gushingly, "are a very important nation, but their history is filled with tragedy."

Although CJSS has been in the forefront of advancing Jewish – and Israeli – studies in contemporary China, Chinese scholars such as Xu Xin have also made valuable contributions. Xu, the founder and director of The Center for Jewish Studies at Nanjing University, recently co-ordinated the release of an abridged version of the Encyclopaedia Judaica, a 900-page tome with 1,600 entries that required the expertise of 40 scholars.

Xu, who is coming to Toronto later this month to deliver lectures at the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, has pioneered Holocaust studies in China.

In a paper delivered at Boston University almost three years ago, Xu wrote that the publication of Anne Frank's diary in China probably marked the first time the Chinese public was exposed to the Holocaust.

Chinese scholars rarely bothered with the Holocaust when China was ardently pro-Arab and denied Israel's very existence.

But when China normalized relations with Israel, Jewish studies in the world's most populous nation emerged from the deep freeze.

A fresh start for the new year

There is a story of an angry reader who stormed into a newspaper office, asking to see who wrote the obituary column. He was referred to a cub reporter, to whom he showed the column and said, "You see, I am very much alive. I demand a retraction!"

The reporter replied, "I never retract a story. But I tell you what I'll do. I'll put you in the birth column and give you a fresh start!"

Between the towns of Padua and Ferrara in northern Italy is a villa with 365 windows. Some people say the original builder had the 365 days of the year in mind when he installed the windows. Perhaps he was suggesting that one could, and should, look upon the world each day from a different point of view.

This suggests an exciting life philosophy – that each day brings its own unique gifts. It remains for us to untie the ribbons and accept the offerings as they appear.

We are inclined to smile when we speak of New Year's resolutions because we know they are more easily made than kept. Yet those who do not have clear goals end up victims of the whims of chance. As the saying goes, "No wind is favourable to one who does not know into which port he is trying to sail."

So why not consider goals that are worthy in the year ahead and remember to:

- Begin each day with the affirmation found in Psalms 118:25: "This is the day that the Lord has made; let us rejoice and be glad in it."
- Give priority to essential concerns. Learn to distinguish what is more important from what is less important without making what is less important unimportant.
- Avoid procrastination. Do the thing you have to do when you have to do it, whether you feel like it or not.
- Do one thing at a time and be all there when you do it. On composer and conductor Toscanini's 80th birthday, someone asked his son, Walter, what his father considered his most important achievement. The reply was, "For him there can be no such thing. Whatever he happens to be doing at the moment is the biggest thing in his life – whether it is conducting a symphony or peeling an orange."
- Do something for someone else each day at some cost to yourself. The waste of life lies in the love we have not given and the powers we have not used. The selfish prudence that risks nothing and attempts to avoid pain misses happiness as well.
- Enjoy life! Judaism, alone among the world religions, urges us to enjoy the pleasures of this world. The ancient rabbis boldly proclaimed, "In the hereafter, every person will be called to account for the earthly pleasures he rejected."

The rabbis believed that the true way to enjoy God's gifts in the world is to use them with discretion, balance, pleasure and enjoyment. The total abstainer is not the finest example of humanity, even as the drunkard is not the model human being. Too much fasting is just as reprehensible as gluttony. Neglect of the body and its needs is just as regrettable as hypochondria.

We serve God best when we enhance the worthwhileness of life by using with appreciation His many gifts. Throughout the ages, Judaism has held firm to the conviction that the world is good and that life is worth living and its possibilities are unending.

Medicine may heal Middle East

By DR. AMAL JASSER

In October in Aqaba, Jordan, 60 representatives from Jordan, the Palestinian Authority and Israel held a two-day planning meeting of the Middle East Association for Managing Hearing Loss (MEHA). The meeting, which was taking place in Jordan for the first time, was led by its Jordanian patron, Prince Firas bin Raad, and hosted by Jordan's Royal Medical Services.

A project of the Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO), MEHA was founded in May 1998 to bring together health and medical professionals in the Middle East to establish a dialogue and address issues of common concern relating to medical and rehabilitative services and scientific and peace-building programs.

The participants included Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada, Donald Sinclair, Canada's ambassador to Israel, as well as the deans of various medical schools, representatives from the Jordanian Ministry of Health and the Royal Medical Services and an interfaith gathering of Christians, Muslims and Jews. The support of Prince Raed and Prince Firas of Jordan through their conference call during the meeting's opening session put participants in a vibrant spirit of joint co-operation.

For two days, I observed with deep satisfaction the work and dialogue of these medical professionals from different nations and religions as they put aside their differences and successfully discussed matters of common interest. I was thrilled to see how the group focused on their similarities and shared concerns while respecting their differences.

During the intensive working days, the participants were divided into groups according to their scientific background: genetics of hearing loss, mother and child health, infectious diseases and a dean's group. They discussed ways to co-operate, examining the possibilities of staff and student exchange programs as well as combined research projects and curriculum development. The groups agreed that it is of vital importance to develop preventive measures against such infectious and communicable diseases in the region as rabies, leishmaniasis, West Nile fever and hepatitis, and to have a database to monitor antibiotic resistance. Health-care issues related to mothers and children, as well as educational awareness programs, were also discussed.

Participants debated various medical, scientific and health issues in a civilized manner. They exchanged their perceptions on the current violence and the state of their nations during lunch or dinner breaks. The discussions I listened to included individuals from the three nations – Jordan, the Palestinian Authority and Israel. It was amazing how they all tried to think of peaceful solutions to the Middle East conflict through focusing on what brought them closer to each other rather than on their differences.

The MEHA meeting is an excellent example of progress toward peace-building through collaborative projects and group integration that benefit the region at large.

I believe the participants' convictions were similar to what Martin Luther King Jr. realized during the American civil rights movement in the 1960s: "Returning violence for violence multiplies violence, adding deeper darkness to a night already devoid of stars. Darkness cannot drive out darkness: only light can do that. Hate cannot drive out hate: only love can do that."

Let us light the torch to enlightenment so that we can see the path to peace and plant the seeds of hope for generations to come.

Dr. Amal Jasser is based at the Jordan University of Science and Technology in Irbid.

Your recommended websites

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Every week, I scour the Internet to tell you about the very best Jewish and Israeli websites. But on the Internet, there's always something new, and thankfully, people who want me to know about it. This week and next, I turn the column over to readers who have recommended sites that have caught their eye – or that they may have created themselves.

Larry Grossman wrote to me from Benicia, Calif., about his site, the Jewish Webcasting Guide. Grossman has been able to find dozens of sites that offer audio and video, and he has organized them according to categories such as Israel, music, news, radio, TV, Torah and Yiddish. For real variety, check out his Judaism page where you find links to videos of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, an Aish HaTorah video about the Kotel and programming on Jewish Reconstructionist Radio. There are several Jewish audio-video indexes on the Web, but this is the best. Kol Hakavod, Larry! [www.jewishwebcasting.com/]

In October, I told you about "blogs" – online diaries where people can bring you everything from personal ruminations to excerpts from articles people feel you should know about. Toronto's Ted Belman would like you to put his Israpundit on your regular reading list. Belman describes himself and co-blogger Joseph Norland of Ottawa as politically "on the right and are against the Roadmap." [www.israpundit.com/]

Rabbi Moshe Yeres is the head of the Talmud and rabbinics department at the Richmond Hill campus of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. He wrote to tell me about how he uses the Internet as a tool for Jewish education. His offerings are quite varied: not only does the rabbi provide commentary about Gemarah, but so do his students – along with some bonuses like Talmud terminology puzzles. Elsewhere, you can read something I haven't found anywhere else on the Internet – the entire Haggadah online, along with observations and annotations by his students. [www.pathcom.com/~mjyeres/] (Full disclosure: Rabbi Yeres is also my teacher. But his site is great, anyway!)

A few weeks ago, I wrote about upcoming deadlines for survivors of the Holocaust who are applying for restitution from European governments. In it I wrote about the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany. [www.ajr.org.uk/claimsconf.htm] After that, I received an e-mail from Sharon Gulko of the Survivor Assistance Office at the Montreal Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors. [www.cummingscentre.org/holocaust.htm] Gulko also asked me to mention that her office is available to assist Holocaust survivors and their families with the latest details about restitution programs, deadlines and application forms. Their information line is 514-345-6434. She also points out that the website I originally quoted should have been referred to as a Goodwill Fund.

Myer Gordon has written to tell me about his wife Judy's book, Four Hundred Brothers and Sisters. Shortlisted for the 2003 Canadian Jewish History Award, it tells the story of two orphanages, the Montreal and Montefiore Orphans' Homes from 1909 to 1942. You can learn more from the Gordons' website. [www3.sympatico.ca/mjnodrog/]

Finally, an update from me. It's hard to believe that it is less than a year since Israeli astronaut Col. Ilan Ramon and his six crew members lost their lives aboard the Space Shuttle Columbia. After the disaster, I mentioned the remarkable shots and video of the mission that you can view on the NASA site. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?B2E131FC6] During this year's investigation of the crash, 84,000 pieces of debris were recovered. Among them were several rolls of film and dozens of photographs. NASA has added to its website a wonderful group shot of the Columbia crew floating in zero gravity and a stunning photograph of a cloudless Israel and southeastern Mediterranean as captured by the astronauts. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?U3C121FC6]

Do you have a favourite Jewish or Israeli website? Or have you created one yourself? Tell me about it at the address below and I may mention it in a future column.

Looking in the face of the stranger

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

A student of mine reveals that her sister's boyfriend drives a Hummer, but also maintains a Ferrari as "his summer car." I respond that I drive a beat up van all year round. Another student talks of her upcoming trip to the Dominican Republic for winter vacation and asks where I am going during the school break. "To the mall," I reply, my deadpan inspiring laughter, and, I imagine on a deeper level, sympathy.

If money makes the world go round, then quite a few modern Jews are whirling dervishes, spinning in ways that would make our ancestors gasp. With daily stories of misery issuing from many parts of the world – tales of hunger and woe – it becomes easy to grow numb and hence disconnected. But the challenge, from the point of view of Jewish ethics, is to maintain a sense of perspective about what we have been blessed with in a monetary sense and how to share these gifts with others.

And it is all too easy to lose such perspective. The former president of the World Bank, Robert McNamara, distinguishes what he calls "absolute poverty" from the relatively comfortable situation of most westerners, even the poorer among us. In McNamara's words, absolute poverty is "a condition of life so characterized by malnutrition, illiteracy, disease, squalid surroundings, high infant mortality and low life expectancy as to be beneath any reasonable definition of human decency."

Confronted with these kinds of global inequalities, many of us rely upon large organizations to act as our charitable go-betweens, and hence we are never really touched by the visceral pain of those in dire straits. According to the Rambam, anonymous giving may seem to represent a Jewish ideal, a higher level in his eight stages of charity than being known to the recipient. Yet in her thoughtful book, Rambam's Ladder, Julie Salamon elicits a different outlook from Misha Avramoff, the remarkable director of Project Ezra, an organization in New York that helps elderly Jews who are having trouble making ends meet. Sometimes, says Avramoff, "you have to look in the face of a stranger to find your own soul… We've moved to the corporate kind of charitable giving, which is fine, but it should never replace the individual notion of feeling a responsibility to participate."

The face of the other – the one we whiz past in our Hummers and minivans – is the face that transforms Jewish book learning into tikkun olam, the mending of the rip in the planetary fabric. To repair the world takes time and attention, precious commodities in a society organized around speed and productivity. It is a test of whether we're basking on foreign beaches or shopping in local malls, and perhaps we react best when we don't have time to ruminate about our portfolios.

The story is told that as the Yom Kippur War broke out, former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir flew to New York to appeal for financial aid for the beleaguered Jewish state.

"I don't have time for you to go home and think about it," she said. "I don't have time for you to consult with your tax advisors. I don't have time for you to leave it in your will. I need it right now."

Golda Meir raised $300 million for Israel that day.

ORT Canada raising funds to aid Israeli school

Carrie Katz-Lehman, the new president of Toronto ORT, is intent on putting the organization on the Canadian radar screen.

"My goal is to turn ORT into a household name," said Katz-Lehman, who moved here from Montreal about six years ago.

She said that along with Renette Berman, national president of ORT, she plans on "blitzing the community, from youth to older people."

Berman said ORT "does tremendous work in so many countries, and many people know nothing about it. It is hard to imagine why."

When she was growing up in South Africa, Berman said, the Jewish community there was committed to ORT. "What ORT did penetrated our consciousness. My mother and grandmother used to have musical soirées to raise money, and I have a 102-year-old aunt who is still raising money.

"ORT is a brilliant organization. With more than 300,000 students and 17,000 educators around the world, it reaches more Jews than any other organization.

Carrie Katz-Lehman

In 123 years, its underlying premise has never wavered."

In Israel alone, she said, there are more than 4,000 ORT students living below the poverty line.

"These are students who have suffered loss. Their classmates have been killed, and some need therapy to help them focus and keep their fears at bay. It is hard to sit in their world and completely understand it."

In order to connect Canada to ORT in Israel in a powerful way, Berman said, ORT Canada has just been given the go-ahead by World ORT – the world's largest private, not-for-profit technological and professional training organization – to renovate a 50-year-old school in Israel.

"Our vision for a totally Canadian project is ambitious. We have identified a school that is in desperate need of renovation, and that is made up of marginal students, many of whom are immigrants. We plan on holding a competition in which we will ask the students how they envision their new school."

This is the biggest fundraising project ORT has undertaken in Canada since the early 1990s, when past national presidents Ruth Druxerman, Harriet Morton and Dorothy Shoichet raised significant funds for the Braude College of Engineering in Karmiel, Berman said.

Renette Berman

Until now, she said, ORT has been a well-kept secret in Canada. "That is going to change. We are planning missions to Israel so people can visit the school, meet the students, and see where their money is going. What ORT does speaks to so many people from so many backgrounds."

"It is exciting, because Canada really has one of the most committed Jewish communities in the world. [As far as ORT] is concerned, I want this to be the dawn of a new beginning in Canada."

Katz-Lehman said she is committed to ORT because "I know that the best investment we can make is in our children. Every time we pluck our children from an environment where there is [no opportunity for them to grow], we create a responsible citizen who gives back socially, spiritually and [economically.]

"When I was offered this position, that spoke to me clearly," said Katz-Lehman.

Israeli program aids haredi men in the IDF

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Netzach Yehuda, a program in which young haredi men serve in the Israel Defence Forces, will benefit the young men themselves, the army and those of the population that must do miluim, (reserve duty), says Tzvi Klebanow.

It also helps ease the tension between the religious and the secular in Israel, since "one of the main complaints against the haredi is that they don't serve in the army," says Klebanow, director of Anshei Chayil, an organization that raises funds to provide extra services to the increasing number of young men joining the program.

"Netzach Yehuda will foster tolerance, understanding and mutual respect, to mend the deepening rift which threatens to tear the nation apart," Klebanow said at an adult education program at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

There are now some 600 soldiers in the unit, which has been accorded battalion status, he said.

The men of the unit, which has increased from 30 in the first recruitment in 1999 to 110 in the last one, are those in the haredi world who are not comfortable, for whatever reason, with the traditional lifestyle of continual yeshiva study. There are two entry periods a year, but Klebanow said he hopes to increase that to three a year, as is the case with the regular army induction.

The men are not drafted into the army, because they have received the deferment the haredi yeshiva student is granted.

After basic training, which takes four months, and two more in advanced training, the men spend 18 months as a combat unit.

Reports are that they have performed very well in the field, participating in operations to track down and capture terrorists, Klebanow said.

After that, they either receive vocational training, return to the yeshiva or study for their bogrut, high school matriculation, "so that they can marry and support their family in an honorable fashion," he added.

Some, he said, even choose to stay in the army, and go on to officers' training. Some have successfully completed the challenging paratroop course.

He estimates that each soldier in the unit replaces some 14 men who would ordinarily be called up to reserve duty, enabling them to continue their normal lives and lessen some of the ongoing damage to the economy.

The army has co-operated in making it possible for these haredi men to serve. They receive food that meets haredi kashrut standards, have regular shiurim (study sessions) and daven the required three times a day.

The army has also recognized their need to avoid contact with women, whether as fellow soldiers, medics or instructors.

The men have another problem that most soldiers do not have: they are usually the first of their family to serve in the army and their army service is often far from a source of pride. Many cannot go home on leave.

The IDF has facilities in every city for soldiers who have no families or whose families are in another country. They are not, however, appropriate for these young men. Anshei Chayil would like to build a centre for Netzach Yehuda participants, which would also serve as an educational facility.

Anshei Chayil also raises funds for such things as armoured vehicles for the rabbis who give shiurim to the soldiers, and for counselling, heavy duty flak jackets and morale boosters such as food treats and parties.

Klebanow is passionate about the significance of these haredi men serving in the IDF. "Think of the bond created when a secular Israeli Jew walks down the street and meets a haredi man, with payes and a beard, but wearing army fatigues with an IDF patch on it."

For more information, contact Klebanow by e-mail at tzvik@actcom.com or in Israel by phone at 011-972-2-651-2987.

JNF Canada provides new ways to help Israelis

The Jewish National Fund of Canada recently sponsored a playground for Israeli children with special needs, located at Kibbutz Magen in the northwestern part of the Negev desert.

The playground includes a unique maze, ramps and slides designed for children with physical and developmental disabilities. Educational games are in the maze, and various stations are designed to enable the children to use their senses of touch, smell and hearing.

The entire area is wheelchair accessible and user friendly, with soft, flexible walking surfaces for safe playing.

Built with the support of Jewish National Fund donors in Canada, the playground also includes a special gymnastics apparatus for children who are visually impaired or who have physical limitations, a sandbox, a gazebo, flowerbeds and a decorative fence.

"The special equipment and learning tools allow the children to learn new motor skills, and this improves the quality of life for them and for their families," said Annette Goldman, JNF president in Montreal.

The project is part of the Havaya Plus Family Enrichment Centre, which serves the Negev. The centre's philosophy regards parents as full partners in moulding the child's personality and education, and encourages them to take an active role in the creative projects it conducts with the children.

"The staff take their roles seriously and genuinely care for the children and their families," said Goldman. "These professionals and this wonderful playground have truly made a difference to their lives."

The Jewish National Fund of Canada has also introduced a new Tree Bank Account program to help support the ongoing planting of trees in Israel. Through the program, donors open an account that enables them to send tribute cards during the year without making a payment for each individual mailing, and without the necessity of providing detailed personal information for each mailing. All the details are handled when the account is opened, or when the balance in the account is replenished.

"Planting trees continues to be a significant part of JNF's work in Israel," said Sandy Posluns, national president of JNF Canada. "The Tree Bank Account makes it easier for donors to help us fulfil this part of our mandate, while being recognized for their generosity by family and friends. This is a very affordable way of expressing their support for Israel. When you plant a tree in Israel, your are planting your roots."

A donation of $18 to JNF is usually needed to plant a tree, but with the Tree Bank Account, trees are only $15 each when blocks of 10 trees are deposited into the donor's personal account, ready for use whenever they are needed.

Since 1901, JNF has planted more than 225 million trees in Israel, allowing supporters from around the world to identify with the Jewish homeland, and bring new life to the land.

For information on JNF's Tree Bank Account, contact the Jewish National Fund of Canada, in Toronto: 416-638-7200; in Montreal: 514-934-0313.

Ratification delayed in student elections at York

University threatens takeover as Hillel-backed slate waits

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The student government election saga at York University is still not over.

The Progress Not Politics (PNP) slate, headed by fourth-year student Paul Cooper, won 27 seats in November elections for the York Federation of Students (YFS). But it's still not in power, because the outgoing YFS council tabled a motion at its Dec. 15 meeting that would have ratified the election results.

Ratification – usually a formality – was expected after the YFS elections committee, at a Dec. 4 hearing, dismissed complaints that Cooper's campaign literature expenses violated campaign spending regulations.

It ruled the cost represented fair market value, with three committee members voting in Cooper's favour and one abstaining. But the YFS council tabled the ratification motion until its next meeting due to allegations the committee member who abstained was intimidated into doing so.

At press time, the YFS office was closed for the holidays, and representatives could not be reached for comment.

"They are in clear violation of their constitution," said Talia Klein, director of Hillel at York, which supported the PNP slate, the first one ever to be endorsed by Hillel at York.

During the campaign, Cooper, who heads the campus group the Young Zionist Partnership, said he and his slate wanted to reorient YFS' focus toward student issues such as parking, security and tuition. Hillel backed the slate, with president Jordie Saperia saying YFS had become increasingly involved in anti-Israel activities.

York vice-president and provost Bonnie Neuman sent a letter to YFS president Mike Novak on Dec. 18 expressing "serious doubts" regarding the decision not to ratify the election results, and drawing attention to several sections of the YFS constitution.

"Although student governments are autonomous," she told The CJN, "we have a role in terms of their constitutions and fiduciary matters to ensure they follow through on the constitutions and proceed in a democratic and orderly basis.

"They do need to ratify at the next meeting [scheduled for Jan. 6], or my role as provost is to step in," she said. "I've asked them to get things resolved that week, then to notify me by the end of the week."

If she is not satisfied, she wrote, she will assume financial trusteeship of YFS.

"I'm not expecting anything other than that my letter will be an encouragement to, on Jan. 6, get this situation back on track and have their vote ratified, at which point there would be no problem."

The PNP slate "had a wonderful success, so I would expect they'll be the next YFS government," said Neuman.

York's administration has been "excellent," said Klein. "They have really taken the issue seriously and are doing everything in their power to help out and make sure students' democratic rights actually prevail."

Saperia, who is also a member of the PNP executive and one of a small Hillel delegation who met with Neuman the day after YFS tabled ratification in a meeting that had already been planned to discuss other issues, said "everybody's pleased on our side" with the measures taken by the administration.

Beloved family and friends, I am 83 years old, and it could easily take the rest of my life to personally thank each and every one of you!!!

I am so grateful, so thankful, but I am not able to write to the hundreds of family and friends that came to the funeral and shiva.

The enormous platters of food, towering platters of fruit, the love notes, the sweet phone calls, the faxes from different places in the world… were just overwhelming.

So please accept, from my heart to yours, a prayer that each one of you have the imprint as a blueprint of Joe's life, to enrich your lives.

With so much gratitude and love,

Scholarship winner starts her writing career

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Jennie Morgan went to buy ketchup chips during her first week as a college student in New York late last summer, she was struck by the realization that "they didn't know what I was talking about.

"It's more different here from Canada than I thought," she said in a phone interview from her dorm.

But it didn't take long for Morgan, a Toronto native and the recipient of this year's Dennis Waldman scholarship (based on academics and Jewish involvement), to carve out a place for herself.

A student at both Columbia University and the Jewish Theological Seminary, Morgan attends Hillel regularly and writes for the Columbia Spectator, the university's daily newspaper. This month, she becomes the paper's deputy news editor.

Jennie Morgan

Notable pieces in her growing portfolio include coverage of Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky's September lecture at Columbia and a column about the recognition of same-sex marriage in Ontario.

In the column, Morgan, who describes herself in the piece as a "middle-of-the-road, straight Canadian," lauds Canada for its legal stand, arguing that gay marriage does not infringe on freedom of religion and noting that clergy are not forced to officiate at such marriages.

As an advocate, she follows in her parents' footsteps. Her father, Ed, is chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and a law professor at the University of Toronto. Her mother, Anna, is a Canadian Jewish News reporter who co-founded a grassroots group called Solidarity with Jews at Risk, in response to a rise in anti-Semitic activity in France.

Although Morgan has not yet declared a major, her interests lie in being "a writer of some sort." Her courses this semester include "Jewish Philosophical Texts" and "American Literature from 1800 to 1870."

She particularly enjoys contemporary Canadian writers such as Margaret Atwood and Alice Munro, both of whom have influenced her outlook and career interests.

Morgan said it's fun to write for the campus paper. "It's definitely work, but I really like doing it." Her mother's work at The CJN has also been an influence, she said.

When she was a high school student at Earl Haig Collegiate, Morgan wrote for the paper there as well. Writing for the Spectator is "extremely different," she said.

"It's more out in the real world. It's available on the street. It's sort of considered the neighbourhood newspaper for Morningside Heights. Also, at Earl Haig, I think that people often don't have time to read it, whereas this paper you know is read. It has made me more enthusiastic – and nervous about doing a good job!"

Her interest in Judaic subjects was sparked in Grade 10, when she attended a "Jewish Diversity Group" for the first time. After attending one session of the weekly program, Morgan was captivated by the mix of observant and non-observant students, the dynamic give-and-take discussion, and their tackling of controversial subject matter.

"It was very fascinating for me," she recalls. Although Morgan said she had "no passion" for Judaism after leaving Jewish day school at the end of Grade 6, she realized at the session that she had "sort of been missing out on Judaism. It sort of brought me back abruptly." Last year she served as one of the group's organizers.

Wasserman eulogized for role in Yiddish theatre

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Yiddish Theatre founder and artistic director Dora Wasserman's passion and sense of purpose were such that time, money or even mundane things such as copyright laws did not stand in her way when she wanted to stage a play.

Obituary

Pinchas Blitt, a longtime actor with the amateur troupe based at the Saidye Bronfman Centre (SBC) recalled at her funeral how she charmed and mollified Nobel Prize-winning author Isaac Bashevis Singer, who was livid that she had dramatized one of his works without permission.

"After he met her, he was completely disarmed and surrendered himself to her direction… He gave her carte blanche to adapt and stage his works," the only person he gave that right to, Blitt said.

Wasserman, who headed the Yiddish Theatre and its predecessor for more than 40 years – leaving only because of ill health – died Dec. 15 at age 84, just two weeks after her husband Sam, affectionately known as Shura. She had been in fragile health for some years after suffering a stroke.

Wasserman also gained the confidence of other Yiddish literary greats Chaim Grade and Abraham Shulman, as well as celebrated Quebec playwright Michel Tremblay, who called her 1992 Yiddish version of Les Belles Soeurs the best interpretation of his play in any foreign language. The production was also hailed as a bridge-builder between the Jewish and Québécois communities.

Wasserman, it seems, never had any doubts.

"She felt there was no reason to ask the author for permission because she was certain he would be as delighted as she was to see it on stage. If Singer was angry and indignant, so what?" Blitt said.

She took a similarly nonchalant attitude to the fact there are only 24 hours in a day. Rehearsals frequently extended past midnight, and sometimes to dawn.

"Dora was never bound or fettered by the ordinary rules of life… No hour was too late, no test too difficult, no challenge too daunting, no sacrifice too great. She was driven by an uncontrolled discipline, and had many wonderful contradictions," Blitt said.

Wasserman's rehearsals are the stuff of legend. She demanded nothing less than the best out of her amateur troupe, who, in return, became as loyal to her as if she were their mother.

"For her, the process of bringing a play to stage was almost God-like. There could be no impediment or interference," Blitt said.

Blitt thinks Wasserman's daring and sometimes brashness in not only preserving Yiddish theatre, but expanding it into genres not seen before, may be explained by the freedom she enjoyed after arriving in Canada in 1950 from the Soviet Union, after years of Stalinist repression.

Born in Chernikhov, Ukraine, in 1919, Wasserman (née Goldfarb) was an actress in the Ukraine and Kazakhstan State Theatres after studying at the Moscow Yiddish Art Theatre.

Wasserman was also hailed for keeping Yiddish culture alive among younger generations of Jews, as well as extending its universal appeal to Montrealers in general. English and French supertitles greatly widened the Yiddish Theatre's audience. It is estimated that about half of its patrons today are not Yiddish-speaking.

She also toured the theatre across Canada and to the United States, Europe, Israel and the former Soviet Union.

As controversial as she could be at times, Wasserman remained respectful of Jewish sensitivities. Before putting on plays such as The Agunah and Shaindele, which challenge religious dogma, Blitt said she first sought the "hechsher" of not one, but two Orthodox rabbis.

Federal justice minister Irwin Cotler, who attended many plays and rehearsals, said Wasserman was a "soulful presence who ignited the neshamah of many others." He called her the "grande dame of Yiddish theatre and the doyenne of Jewish culture."

In a written message, Gov. Gen. Adrienne Clarkson cited her "enthusiasm and joyous spirit." Wasserman was named to the Order of Canada in 1992, and this past October to the Order of Quebec.

The Theatre's forerunner, the Yiddish Drama Group, founded in 1956, had its origins in the gym of Jewish People's School, where Wasserman taught drama to children.

Even in the early years, she reached out to the broader community. Theatre great Gratien Gélinas of the Comédie Canadienne was an early collaborator.

The group, many of whom were "folkshuler" graduates, struggled because it had no permanent home, Singer said. Then, in 1967, the SBC opened and made the Yiddish Theatre a resident company. Wasserman remained at the helm for more than 30 years.

Today, under the direction of Wasserman's daughter Bryna Wasserman, it is the only permanent resident Yiddish theatre in North America.

Dora Wasserman directed more than 70 plays in Montreal, from beloved classics to translated plays of the Quebec and international repertoire to original works. Ever mindful of the long term, Wasserman never stopped working with children and teens, inspiring them with her love of the Yiddish theatre.

Fittingly, Wasserman's funeral cortege, led by police escort, passed by the SBC and paused for a moment of tribute.

JDS founder shares wisdom with new group for entrepeneurs

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Nearly 100 young Jewish entrepreneurs and professionals attended the inaugural event of YOZMA, the UJA-sponsored Young Jewish Business Network, at the Embassy West Hotel last month.

Modelled after similar organizations in Montreal and Toronto, YOZMA – Hebrew for "initiative" – is geared to Jewish businesspeople between 25 and 40. The idea is to provide them with networking opportunities, both with each other and with older, more experienced business professionals who can offer mentorship and guidance.

"The goal is to keep them connected to the community," said Jesse Lepow, development associate with UJA. "It is also for the employers in the community to recognize the talents of young people and give them an opportunity. It's a network for people to make contacts and connect in a Jewish way."

The opening event was a rare opportunity for an informal question-and-answer session with Jozef Straus, the founder and former CEO of prominent high tech stalwart JDS Uniphase.

Though he officially retired as CEO in September, Straus made it clear that he is still a JDS director and continues to go to work every day.

When asked how he knew it was time to retire, Straus replied: "I am still working every day, but you need to learn to disconnect from the daily operation. I can do other things that I could not do before and it allows me to look at things from a different perspective."

With a twinkle in his eye, he added, "This is my first retirement."

Straus' humour came through again when he was asked what he would like his legacy to be.

"I'm not dead yet!" he said. "It would be presumptuous of me to talk about it."

Many in the audience were curious about how Straus, an Orthodox Jew, managed to reconcile his lifestyle with the fast-paced, high-pressure business world.

He replied that Shabbat gave him an enforced break from his hectic routine and provided much-needed family time.

He also said he travels with very heavy luggage, full of canned tuna, and added that, "Bananas you can buy anywhere."

Although he has had an incredibly successful business career, Straus said he "didn't know what a purchase order was until I had to write one," and that if he were to start his studies over again, he would include a course in economics.

"The secret to grow your business is to always hire people better than you," he advised.

He also warned that heading up a company "is not an eight-hour job. You have to live and breathe your business."

When asked about the responsibilities of young entrepreneurs to their community, Straus said, "If the community supports them, they will support their community."

He said the association is weighing its options, including asking the Jewish public to clip Chanukah greetings that Premier Dalton McGuinty and Liberal MPPs placed in The CJN and mail them back to the politicians.

"By taking funding away from Jewish education, they are hitting Jewish identity," Blumenfeld said. "On the other hand, they're wishing us a Happy Chanukah, which is all about retaining Jewish identity."

The group will adopt a two-pronged approach: taking the government up on discussions on an alternative to the tax credit, along with other religious communities, while engaging in "serious protest measures."

Walfish and Blumenfeld say it's too early to talk about possible legal remedies, such as taking the government to court, but they don't rule the tactic out.

Another possibility is appealing to the federal cabinet under a section of the Charter of Rights that deals with the rights of religious minorities.

The tax credit's repeal creates and perpetuates "state-sponsored" religious discrimination, the association's leaders say.

But also disturbing is the fact it was rescinded retroactively, which is nearly unheard of in tax law.

Last month, Jack Mintz and William Robson of the C.D. Howe Institute wrote that should Bill 2 be passed, it would "set an ominous precedent for Canadian taxpayers everywhere."

They called retroactive taxation unfair and damaging because "it means that people discover, after they have already bought and sold, worked and saved, that the government has changed the rules. Its arbitrariness undermines the rule of law."

Ottawa-area Tory MPP Norman Sterling, one of many members who spoke to the bill on the day it was passed, called the government's stance "unbelievably mean and nasty" and that it "yanked the rug out from under" parents of children in private and faith-based schools.

"What this government is doing here is discriminating against Jewish people… You are discriminating against minority religious groups who should have the right to have their own religious schools.

"This is discriminatory on the part of this government. That is the most distasteful part of this legislation. You are discriminating," Sterling said.

"I believe in the Orthodox Jewish religion, they have to send their kids to religious schools… According to what they believe in, they have to send them to religious schools, which is probably a greater burden upon them in terms of living within their religious principles than other religious groups. We're saying to the Orthodox Jews, 'You cannot get any help from the government with regard to your religious schools,' yet we did it for 43 per cent of the population [Roman Catholics, who received full funding for their schools in 1986]."

Survivor seeks compensation from French gov't

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jean-Jacques Fraenkel, a Holocaust survivor whose parents died in Auschwitz, has been fighting a battle for several years to have France compensate survivors or their heirs for the goods the pro-Nazi Pétain regime robbed them of during the war.

A Canadian citizen who now lives in Victoria, Fraenkel is the founder of a group called the Coordination offshore des enfants survivants de la Shoah ayant vécu en France (the offshore association of child survivors of the Shoah who lived in France).

In an interview, Fraenkel spoke of the Homeric battle his association is now fighting with an intransigent French administration.

Canadian Jewish News: What are the main objectives of your association?

Fraenkel: The Coordination offshore des enfants survivants de la Shoah ayant vécu en France is an international association headquartered in Canada that has no direct ties with France. Its only goal is to defend the honour, the memory and the rights of all the survivors in question. Thirty-five per cent of these survivors live in France and 65 per cent in other countries. We believe the 65 per cent who live outside of France have the same rights as those living in France. Our goal is to get compensation for all survivors who were despoiled and persecuted in France during the war.

Fraenkel: Absolutely. We believe the survivors no longer living in France should have a say, too. They are not subject to the dictates and the will of various French governments and administrations that rule over their own national affairs any way they want but take no responsibility for citizens who are for example Jewish Canadians, Israelis, Americans or Australians.

Our association is run by three volunteers, and we have very few financial resources. The principal Jewish institutions of France, including the CRIF (the umbrella organization for Jewish groups in France) refuse to have anything to do with us and prefer to ignore our actions, in order not to embarrass the French government. We represent about 18,000 families we feel were robbed.

Fraenkel: Most of them do not have the financial means to go to France to defend their rights. Many are very old, and they are ill. They have never received information telling them the steps required to claim compensation for goods taken from them during the war. Communication provided by the French ambassadors responsible for this was very poor, as was that of Canadian Jewish Congress, especially its Montreal office, which never passed on the information to the members of the Canadian Jewish community.

Fighting battle on behalf of all who suffered

There are many survivors living in Canada, the United States and Israel, who, for lack of information, have never submitted their files to the French authorities. But, thanks to Radio Shalom in Montreal, which broadcast information on several programs, some Montrealers and Americans did send their files to our organization.

CJN: What are you asking for?

Fraenkel: We are asking that the survivors, or their descendants, whose families were despoiled in France during the war, be compensated in an equitable way – in a way that is truly equitable and not the way it is done in France today. Until now, the Commission de l'indemnisation française (French compensation commission), created in September 1999 by former prime minister Lionel Jospin, has received 15,000 applications seeking compensation. In two years, the number should be about 18,000. What we are asking for is restitution. When someone is robbed, you start by restoring the stolen goods to him and then you compensate him for having been a victim. The French government today is skipping the restitution and speaking directly of compensation. Yet, the compensation is zero, nothing, very little, not much… It is never the equivalent of restitution. Thus, there is a gap here. You have to remember that the despoilment of the Jews in France was the first national industry of the period.

CJN: What kind of goods was the commission supposed to provide compensation for?

Fraenkel: The commission was supposed to compensate for goods found in apartments that were robbed. Almost 100 per cent of the goods in the apartments of Jewish families living in France who perished in Auschwitz or survived were largely despoiled by the French population. The commission was supposed to compensate businesses – grocers, clothing manufacturers, craftsmen, hair stylists, antique dealers, as well as large and small businesses.

Eighty per cent of the large fortunes taken from the Jews who lived in France were restored after the war. The files now being studied by the Commission d'indemnisation are those of immigrants from Poland and other eastern European countries who fled the Nazis and sought refuge in France, and of the 25 per cent of Jews settled in France for a long time, more or less integrated into French society, who represent the bourgeoisie.

CJN: What are the main steps to follow in the compensation process?

Fraenkel: The applicants, or the victims, must complete a file of about 15 pages indicating the nature of the economic loss that they or their family sustained. They must provide as many details as possible. Without these details, the Commission d'indemnisation will not study the file.

It is very difficult, 60 years later, to ask people who are 60, 70, 80, 90 or 100 years old, or their grandchildren, to know exactly where the family lived. How many rooms were there in their home? Was there one or several bathrooms? One or several showers? One or two kitchens? How was the apartment furnished? What floor was the apartment on?

They ask for all this information because the amount of the compensation is established according to the size of the apartment and the number of rooms, the number of people living there, the category of the building in which the residence was located.

CJN: That must be a very difficult test.

Fraenkel: It's true psychological torture. To manage to survive the Holocaust, these survivors tried to forget everything, and completely remake their lives. Now they are being asked to state in writing what possessions their parents had and to find proof of this. They have to search through the records of different French administrations, and Heaven only knows if anything is available, because the Commission d'indemnisation won't do anything to help.

These people are completely traumatized and stressed because they are being asked to reopen a wound that never completely closed. And that is only the beginning, because when the commission members begin to administer these proofs, they do their best to refute them, telling the applicants, for example, that the apartment had four rooms, not five. The commission representative investigating the claim generally questions every item.

CJN: Did you face this insult?

Fraenkel: Yes. My father was the first dental surgeon in France. This is testified to in all the documents I submitted to the Commission d'indemnisation. My representative, who was clearly anti-Semitic, told me shamelessly, "No, your father was perhaps only one of the important ones."

He tries to undermine you and demolish you and make you feel the compensation the commission wants to give you is reasonable.

Observant deportees avoid Shabbat flight

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) succeeded at the last minute in seeing that two shomer Shabbat Jews being deported did not have to fly on the evening of Friday, Dec. 12.

CJC Quebec Region executive director David Birnbaum said the two young men were put on a plane from Montreal to France the next day at about 8 p.m.

Birnbaum credited Vito Vassallo, director of immigration for the Lester Pearson and Pierre Elliott Trudeau airports, for making the switch possible.

The two individuals, one a minor of 17, were of French and Israeli nationality, according to CJC.

Birnbaum said he did not know all the details of their cases, but CJC was satisfied that they had received due process and their deportation was justified. "There was no suggestion that they had been involved in any criminal or violent activity. It appears their papers were not in order."

The story began on Friday morning when CJC Quebec Region president Joseph Gabay received a phone call on behalf of the pair, who were scheduled to leave on a 5 p.m. flight.

"The matter was complicated by the fact that at that time the government changeover was taking place and it was difficult to reach the authorities," Birnbaum said. (Prime Minister Paul Martin and his cabinet were being sworn in that morning.)

"We called the office of Denis Coderre, but he was no longer immigration minister, and we didn't yet know who his successor was," he said.

Birnbaum got in touch with the department's director of administrative services, who directed him to Vassallo.

"At 12:30 p.m., we had his personal guarantee that [the two deportees] would be switched to a flight the next night."

Because they had reportedly tried to flee the day before, they spent the night at a detention facility in Laval. With the co-operation of its director, CJC was able to arrange that they received kosher food.

Israel won't let Iran become nuclear: Mofaz

By AMIR OREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel is considering an operation to destroy Iran's nuclear capabilities, according to Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz.

Speaking in Persian late last month on an an Israel Radio call-in show broadcast across the Middle East, Mofaz said if the need arises to destroy Iran's nuclear capability, "the necessary steps will be taken so that Iranian citizens will not be harmed."

Mofaz's radio statements, which he made before the deadly earthquake in the Islamic republic, were the first of their kind by a high-ranking Israeli. They followed earlier ones he made in Washington, D.C., last fall when he called Iran's nuclearization "insufferable" and said Israel would take steps to stop it.

In response to Mofaz's radio comments, senior Iranian army officers and officials warned that Iran would respond with overwhelming military force to any Israeli attack on its nuclear facilities.

Shaul Mofaz

"The Zionist regime knows that the armed forces of the Islamic republic, and especially its air force, have such high capabilities that if [Israel] carries out a military attack against Iran, it will be digging its own grave," Gen. Seyed Reza Pardis, the head of the Iranian Air Force, told the Iranian news agency Mehr.

Iranian President Mohammed Khatami said Israel would be "swept away" if it dared to attack Iran.

If if decided to do so, it would not be the first time Israel took such pre-emptive action.

The bombing of an Iraqi nuclear reactor near Baghdad in 1981 was carried out on a local holiday when the facility was assumed to be empty or nearly empty, and one person, a French technician, was killed in the attack. Observers said Mofaz's comments about minimizing civilian casualties was a reference to advances made in targeting over the last two decades.

Senior Israeli officials have been less direct than Mofaz in their recent pronouncements about Iranian nuclear capability. In a report to the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee, Mossad head Meir Dagan recently described the Iranian threat as the greatest one Israel has ever faced, but he did not say how Israel would counter it.

Gerald Steinberg, a professor of political science at Bar-Ilan University, told the New York Jewish Week that Mofaz's comments were "inconsistent with Israeli policy, which is certainly not to threaten direct action against Iran.

"I'm pretty sure Mofaz said it without coordination [with the Israeli government]. … Iran is to be referred to as a threat, never as an enemy."

Mofaz, who was born in Iran and left with his family at age nine, said Israel bears no animosity toward the Iranian people. The two countries had good relations until a few years ago, he noted, adding Israel has no aggressive plans against Iran. However, if Israel is attacked, he said, it will use all means to defend its territory and its citizens.

Iran's deputy defence minister said last month that Iran had neglected the development of its long-range Shihab 4 missile and is upgrading the Shihab 3.

The range of the Shihab 3, estimated until last summer at 1,300 kilometres, has been extended to make it possible to hit Israel from central Iran. A military parade in Tehran a few weeks ago contained a model of the Shihab 3, with the claim that its range is 1,700 kilometres – "straight into the heart of the enemy."

Also last month, diplomats and arms experts told Associated Press that Pakistani scientists may have played a major role in advancing Iran's nuclear program, but more than a half-dozen other countries are now being drawn into a UN probe of the Islamic republic.

A month-long probe by the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency traced the origins of Iran's program to the late 1980s, when it was supplied with the first drawings on centrifuge technology – its main way of enriching uranium – leading to suspicions it was developing nuclear weapons.

The investigations have widened "well beyond" Pakistan, Russia and China to include companies in Germany, Switzerland, Austria and other West European countries, said one diplomat.

There are no UN or other international sanctions against Iran that would have prevented foreign firms from providing equipment that could be used in a nuclear program. But investigating companies yielded useful information when the world body investigated Iraq's weapons programs in the early 1990s.

Iran insists its nuclear activities are peaceful. But suspicions have heightened with revelations it was enriching uranium, and the discovery of traces of weapons-grade enriched uranium on some of its centrifuge equipment.

Neither Iran nor the IAEA have revealed the countries of origin, but diplomats have previously told AP that Pakistan, China and Russia were among the probable suppliers.

After months of intense international pressure, Iran is now co-operating with IAEA efforts to unravel nearly two decades of covert activities that the United States and other countries say point to a weapons program.

Iran and North Korea are the key concerns of the IAEA, whose main task is to curb weapons proliferation through inspections and monitoring of countries that have ratified the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

UNSPEAKABLE SORROW: Friends and family mourn at the funeral of Adva Fisher. Twenty-year-old Fisher and three others – Noam Leibovitch, 21, Rotem Weinberger, 19, and Angelina Shcherov, 19 – were killed by a suicide bomber last week at a bus stop along the busy road between Petach Tikvah and Bnei Brak. It was the first suicide bombing since Oct. 4, when 21 people were killed at a restaurant in Haifa. [Israel photo]

Palestinian gays seek safety in Israel

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Belying its name, Electricity Park is shrouded in darkness – an ideal spot for curb-crawlers keen to avoid attention as they prowl for male prostitutes at night.

The anonymity these streets offer serves as a refuge for the young men who ply their trade in this dismal corner of Tel Aviv. Many of them have far more to fear than the police or the occasional abusive client.

Tricked out in drag or the tight, modish attire of western urban youth, dozens of gay Palestinian runaways eke out a dangerous living on Israel's streets.

For these gay men, life in the seedy parts of central Israel is far better than the virtual death sentences they fled in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Sani – not his real name – grew up outside Gaza City, in a refugee camp whose clan networks and congestion made privacy practically impossible. He said he realized he was homosexual at age 16, in an encounter with another youth.

Sani's secret was safe from his father, a local sheik, but eventually it leaked out to the Palestinian Authority police.

"They brought me in, held me for hours," he told JTA. "During one round of questioning, they made me strip and sit on a Coke bottle. It hurt. And all the time I was more worried my family would learn why."

Torture by PA security services or vigilante attacks by relatives are a common experience for countless gays in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, where sodomy carries a jail term of three to 10 years.

Islam prescribes capital punishment for homosexual activity.

Those who survive torture and attacks either fade into meek self-abnegation or, like Sani, break away. But the latter is an unlikely scenario, given the efforts Israel has made to tighten its borders over the last three years to keep out terrorists.

Sani's freedom came at a price: he had to report other Palestinian gays to the police. But as soon as he got out of the Gaza lock-up, Sani got out of Gaza for good, posing as a day labourer to escape to the safety of Israel proper, where he joined an estimated 300 fellow gay runaways.

Now 22, Sani is always on the move, lodging with friends or rich clients he meets at Tel Aviv's bathhouses. If he is short on cash, he knows he can resort to street-walking in Electricity Park.

Sani phones home every few months to assure his mother that he is okay – on condition that she doesn't tell his father and brothers anything about the conversations.

"She says they consider me dead, and it's better that way," he said. "I have nightmares about them coming to kill me."

According to Shaul Gonen of Agudah, Israel's homosexual rights association, at least three Palestinian runaways have been abducted by vengeful kinsmen, and have not been heard from again.

"Being gay in the PA is, quite simply, deadly," Gonen said.

Israel's preoccupation with security also means that the runaways, who are in the country illegally, run the risk of being deported if caught.

"The first danger to them is from family and community, as well as authorities" in the PA-controlled areas, Donatella Rovera of Amnesty International told Reuters. "Going to Israel is a one-way ticket, and once there, their biggest problem is possibly being sent back."

Israel signed the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees covenant of 1951, guaranteeing asylum for anyone persecuted on the basis of sexual orientation. The country's Interior Ministry said any gay Palestinian can apply to remain in Israel indefinitely if persecution is proven, but the ministry gave no figures on how many such applications have been filed.

Another option for the Palestinians is to seek haven abroad. One gay Israeli-Palestinian couple found a home in Canada, and Gonen currently is campaigning to persuade European Union nations to be more forthcoming with offers of asylum.

Torture by PA security services or vigilante attacks by relatives are a common experience for countless gays in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, where sodomy carries a jail term of three to 10 years

Many runaways are apparently unaware of their rights, or worried that they could find themselves on the wrong side of an Israeli military checkpoint through some bureaucratic bungle before their asylum application is processed.

"Why should I take any risk of exposure? How can I trust this or that cop who arrests me to grant me my rights, when he probably thinks I'm a suicide bomber?" said a 30-year-old runaway from a village near the West Bank city of Jenin.

One 19-year-old runaway told Israel's Channel One TV that the Al-Aksa Brigade, the terrorist wing of the Palestinians' mainstream Fatah movement, tried to pressure him into becoming a suicide bomber to "purge his moral guilt." He refused and fled to an Arab village in Israel's Galilee region.

Gonen tells of a gay Palestinian runaway in Tel Aviv who helped catch a terrorist. Overhearing an illegal Palestinian labourer speak, the runaway grew suspicious. The man claimed to be from the West Bank, but his accent was Gazan. The runaway reported the labourer to the authorities through an Israeli friend, and police who arrested the labourer discovered he was a terrorist fugitive.

Palestinian homosexuals often elicit more suspicion at home than in Israel, regularly drawing accusations that they collaborate with the Shin Bet.

Hassan Khreisheh, head of the Palestinian legislative council's human rights committee, dismissed the runaways in Israel as "collaborators guilty of various crimes, including homosexuality."

Human rights observers suggest that Palestinian gays, fearing for their lives if exposed, are especially vulnerable to Shin Bet blackmail. But a veteran handler of collaborators, Menachem Landau, denied this.

"Gays are already treated with suspicion in Palestinian society," Landau said. "So what good are they for covert work?"

They pick up Hebrew and make all efforts to erase their Arabic accents. Military dog tags and Star of David medallions are de rigeur as an Israeli disguise. They save up money for private medical care in lieu of hospital visits when they fall ill. The Electricity Park crowd has learned to spot plainclothes police from afar.

The 30-year-old runaway from a village near Jenin works in a Tel Aviv restaurant using an identification card loaned to him by an Israeli Arab friend. He lives with his Jewish partner in the quiet Tel Aviv suburb of Holon.

"With any luck, I'll go unnoticed until there is peace," he said.

Past conjectures about demographic trends that affect the numerical relationship between Jews and Arabs have generally turned out to be wrong. But even if they turned out to be accurate this time, they do not add up to a demographic threat and are not relevant to preserving a Jewish majority in Israel.

It makes no difference how many Palestinians are born in the Gaza Strip, in Nablus or in Jenin if Israel has no intention of annexing those areas. The Jewish majority in Israel is not affected by the number of Arabs who live outside the country.

Since 1993, Israel's political leadership has moved in the direction of partitioning the land of Israel. The majority of Likud leaders have also accepted the partition idea and ruled out the possibility of permanent Israeli rule over Palestinian population centres.

However, as long as Palestinians continue to offer a fertile ground for terrorism, Jews will have to intervene militarily within the Palestinian population, including their urban centres. Israel will have to get used to living with fluctuations in the size and nature of the Israeli presence in the territories, unless Egypt and Jordan assume responsibility for the Palestinian territories in the near future. The demography issue is not relevant to the need to defend Israel.

Palestinians themselves should have a clear interest in drastically reducing their consistently high birthrate. According to Palestinian economists, the current birthrate will oblige the Palestinian economy to grow permanently by seven to eight per cent a year just to supply work to all the young people who will enter the workforce. A growth rate on that scale is not within the grasp of the Palestinian economy, even if the flow of money from abroad increases.

Indeed, we can expect a reduction of this aid to the Palestinians as a result of the demand for greater transparency and as a result of the appearance of other areas of need, such as Iraq. The Palestinians, like the Egyptians and other Muslim countries, will be obliged to encourage supervision over the birth rate if they want to escape protracted poverty. Time will thus weaken the Palestinian entity unless it is exploited intelligently for a change in demographic trends.

Time is also on Israel's side because the majority of the civilized world has at long last understood that the Palestinian national movement is in need of a thorough reform and new leadership. The Palestinians' main method of operation – terrorism – does not enjoy international legitimacy.

Moreover, the Palestinians have not moved any closer to establishing a state than they were in September 2000. In fact, their condition is worse from every point of view and there are no signs of improvement on the horizon.

Finally, the spirit of the time, which lauds the values of democracy and the free market, leans more to the Israeli side than the Palestinian. The Jews have exploited time better than the Arabs, and this seems set to continue.

Ephraim Inbar teaches political science at Bar-Ilan University and is the director of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Research.

Israel's economy

The report also revealed that the average monthly income per household in the top 10 per cent is 14 times higher than that of the bottom 10 per cent.

The authors of the report are not optimistic about the prospects of reducing economic gaps in Israeli society in the future.

"In the past two years, the government has initiated six large budget cuts, which resulted in significant blows to welfare, education, health care and housing. In addition, the government has reduced public sector jobs. All combined, the blows are expected to exacerbate poverty, lower the standard of living of wide sectors of the population, and hurt the chances of the younger generation to develop and base itself," the report said.

New Command Centre

Israel is building an underground wartime command centre near Jerusalem. The centre would be connected to the government complex, an Israeli television station reported. A spokesperson for Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said the project has been underway for a while.

Security Briefing

Israel's top security official said Israelis have not been provided with enough security. As well, Avi Dichter, the head of the Shin Bet, said the security barrier Israel is building in the West Bank is critical to the country's safety, and he warned of the threat posed by Jewish extremists who seek to eliminate the mosques on Jerusalem's Temple Mount. Dichter also reiterated that he believes Iran is the world's greatest terrorist threat.

Iraqi Baby Dies

An Iraqi baby brought to Israel for emergency surgery has died. Bayan Jassem, who suffered from a heart defect, came to Israel a few weeks after she was born. She developed complications following a 10-hour operation on Nov. 26.

Unilateral Steps?

Israel will separate itself from the Palestinians unilaterally unless they come to the peace table, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said last month. Israelis must prepare for "unprecedentedly difficult" steps, including the evacuation of settlements, he said. The Palestinians stand to gain much more if they fulfill the conditions of the "road map" peace plan and dismantle terrorist groups, Sharon said, but if not, Israel will take unilateral steps "within months" to separate from them. A negotiated settlement would include a Palestinian state with territorial contiguity in the West Bank, Sharon said. He also pledged an immediate freeze on settlement construction, including dismantling illegal outposts, ending growth within existing settlements and halting financial incentives to move to settlements.

Trading Death Cards

Palestinian children are collecting cards that show gunmen and soldiers the way North American kids collect and trade baseball cards, and some educators are concerned that the popular hobby is helping to breed a new generation that glorify violence and terrorists. The cards are an enormous hit, according to Majdi Taher, who makes them. He said 6 million cards have been sold over two years. He plans to expand his business.

Army Sweeps Rafah

Nine Palestinians in the Rafah area were killed in an operation last month by the Israel Defence Forces to locate and destroy tunnels used to smuggle weapons across the Egypt-Gaza border.

Israel stands up for itself during rough year at UN

By RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Last year's General Assembly of the United Nations ended just as it began – with Israel standing basically alone.

In one of the last actions of last year's annual three-month gathering, Israel was the only country to abstain when Ireland offered its annual resolution on religious tolerance.

"Given the upsurge in anti-Semitism, we cannot support a resolution on religious tolerance without mentioning anti-Semitism by name," said Arye Mekel, deputy permanent representative of Israel to the United Nations.

"We represent not just the Jewish state, but the Jewish people," said Mekel.

The session that ended last month saw some of the most strident attacks against Israel in years, but at the same time some of its most serious advances.

In addition to the customary passage of some 20 resolutions Israel considers hostile, the flurry of activity came in the form of many firsts:

- For the first time in a decade, Palestinians tried to challenge Israel's UN credentials, but failed;
- The first resolution explicitly condemning anti-Semitism was offered, but its sponsor, Ireland, later withdrew it due to lack of support;
- Israel, for the first time in 25 years, sponsored a resolution. Israel later withdrew the resolution, which expressed concern for Israeli children facing the threat of terrorism – a mirror image of a resolution passed by the General Assembly on Palestinian children – after what it termed a "hostile takeover" attempt by Arab states to co-opt it.

For UN watchers and for activists battling for Israel at the United Nations, it was a time of resolve and fatigue.

"All of this put together is clear evidence of a very bad year at the UN [for Israel] – probably the worst in a very long time," said David Goldberg, director of research and education at the Canada-Israel Committee.

"If one is looking for any type of silver lining in a very dark cloud, it's that Israel took a very aggressive stance [at the General Assembly]. It was trying to stare down its diplomatic enemies – it wasn't just sitting back and taking punches," he said.

He added that Israel's decision "not just to rely on its friends, but to stand up and defend its own interests" may be only "only a moral victory, or only a temporary victory or it may point to a more positive long-term relationship between Israel and the UN."

Mekel said 2003 "showed more than ever the duplicity and the double standards of the United Nations against Israel."

He specifically cited an unprecedented three emergency sessions called to discuss Israel – two to condemn Israel's security fence and one blasting Israel's talk of expelling Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

But Israel's advocates also point to several victories.

For one, the Jewish state, which had never before been elected to a UN committee, gained representation on more UN bodies than ever before, Mekel said.

From 2004 through 2007, Israel will serve on a committee on narcotic drugs, an environmental protection governing council, and Habitat, an organization that resettles people.

Israel is currently vice-chair of the UN General Assembly legal committee and will serve on a committee on international trade law for the next six years.

Israel also serves on a disarmament committee and earlier in the year, vice-chaired a UN disarmament conference.

Israel's election to these posts was "one of the most important things that happened this year," Mekel said. "What it actually means is that Israeli experts will participate in these operations and make a contribution" beyond just defending itself vis-a-vis the Palestinians.

The positions came as a result of endorsements from the regional group Israel belongs to – the Western Europe and Others Group, or WEOG.

In May 2000, Israel, then the only country excluded from a regional grouping, was permitted to join WEOG. But countries can only apply for positions after being members in the regional group for two years. In April, Israel will assume the rotating chair of WEOG.

The United States, which almost always votes with Israel on the key issues, lobbied both for Israel's placement on a regional grouping and its recent appointments.

It also urged UN members to oppose or abstain from the many resolutions on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"Our belief is that it has to be the two parties sitting down negotiating these issues, not resolutions here in the [General Assembly]," said a U.S. official at the United Nations. "All these resolutions do is further harden the position of both sides."

Indeed, the barrage of pro-Palestinian resolutions appears to have caused a backlash. That was evident last month when the Palestinians failed in an attempt to displace Israel and obtain their own credentials to represent the West Bank, Gaza and parts of Jerusalem.

After learning that Europe, which often influences others at the United Nations, would oppose the measure, the Palestinians chose not to bring the resolution to a vote.

And when the Palestinians pushed a resolution earlier this month calling on the Hague's International Court of Justice to assess the legality of Israel's security fence, European abstentions led to dozens more.

While the resolution still passed 90-8, with 74 abstentions, it was seen as a moral victory for Israel. Still, the measure worries Israel and Jewish activists, and last month the Hague said it would hold hearings on the fence starting Feb. 23.

While Israel supports the road map, it worries that the resolution empowers the United Nations over the United States. It also hands the Palestinians a tool they can use to seek Security Council scrutiny of Israel's compliance.

Such episodes and others reveal the extent of Israel's struggle at the United Nations, say Jewish activists.

"The most shameful moments came in the fate of the Irish resolution, and also in the Israeli attempt to focus on the plight of the Israeli children as victims of terror," said David Harris, the executive director of the American Jewish Committee.

"Tragically, the UN [General Assembly] is unwilling to face up to anti-Semitism as a separate and distinct threat, and to the plight of Israeli children who've been among the victims of terrorist acts," Harris said.

British chief rabbi urged to resign

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Britain's Orthodox chief rabbi got a most-unwelcome Chanukah present from one of British Jewry's most formidable figures: a call for his resignation.

Writing in London's Jewish Chronicle, Sir Stanley Kalms accused Rabbi Jonathan Sacks of having a "diffident personality," showing "low-key leadership" and of panicking when confronted by crisis.

Mishandled controversies have reduced Rabbi Sacks' stature to that of a "shuttlecock" between the "fundamentalist right and the radical left," Kalms wrote.

He accused Rabbi Sacks of failing to speak out on key issues such as anti-Semitism, Israel and kosher slaughter, which is under attack in the United Kingdom.

"The chief rabbi, caught between the activists who said 'come out fighting' and the low-profilers, chose the latter – with apparent relief," Kalms wrote.

"And so the chief rabbi has concentrated on his pastoral role and has hardly said a memorable word in public since. The pygmies won the day and Gulliver was tied up."

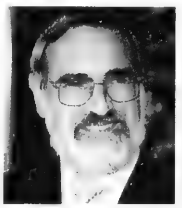
Rabbi Sacks has refused to comment on the matter. But the Chief Rabbi's Office noted this is not the first time Kalms has called for Rabbi Sacks to step down. He did so five years ago as well.

"Sir Stanley's favourite hobby seems to be calling for the chief rabbi to resign," said Peter Sheldon, chairman of the Chief Rabbinate Trust.

"This is chutzpah in the extreme," he added, saying it was not for "self-appointed individuals to issue public performance appraisals that are flawed in their assumptions and flawed in their conclusions."

But Kalms is not just any disgruntled critic. The 71-year-old businessman was one of the strongest proponents of Rabbi Sacks' appointment as chief rabbi 12 years ago.

Kalms is also a former officer in the centrist Orthodox United Synagogue, of which Rabbi Sacks is chief rabbi, and he is one of the Chief Rabbi's Office's "funding fathers," a group of wealthy benefactors who provide much of the money to run the office.



Rabbi Jonathan Sacks

Geoffrey Alderman, a leading historian of British Jewry, said Rabbi Sacks will not be able to keep his position if Kalms is speaking for the "funding fathers."

"Stanley Kalms by himself can't get [Rabbi] Sacks to resign, but he has a big stick to wave," he said. "I don't think [Rabbi] Sacks will go quietly, but one thing that would push him out is the withdrawal of support from the 'funding fathers.'"

But he said it's possible Kalms went public with his criticism because other influential figures did not support him.

"Did Kalms write the article because he was exasperated that the other 'funding fathers' won't back him?" Alderman asked.

Observers say Rabbi Sacks' position is weaker than it was when Kalms last went on the attack five years ago, noting that two controversies in slightly more than a year have reduced his stature.

In the first, Rabbi Sacks gave an interview to the Guardian newspaper – which many Jews consider hostile to Israel – that the paper portrayed as an attack on the Jewish state.

Afterward, leading Israeli rabbis demanded that Rabbi Sacks step down.

Some Orthodox rabbis in Britain and Israel threatened to declare Rabbi Sacks an apostate over his assertion that other monotheistic religions could be as valid for their adherents as Judaism is for Jews.

Rabbi Sacks issued a revised edition of the book that quelled criticism from the right, but upset more liberal community members who wanted him to stick to his guns.

The apparent unwillingness to maintain an unpopular position has lost Rabbi Sacks respect, Alderman said.

"He has tried to be all things to all men, and he has been caught out," the historian said.

Rabbi Sacks won a $200,000 (US) prize for the Dignity of Difference from an American foundation just weeks before Kalms' criticism.

Kalms mentioned both the Guardian and Dignity of Difference controversies in his article.

But if Rabbi Sacks has been diminished by controversy, Kalms himself is not the figure he was five years ago, one insider said.

"Kalms has not held a communal position for a long time, as a result of which he makes mistakes," said the figure, who asked not to be named. Rabbi Sacks "should dismiss this as the work of a grumpy old man."

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Swan's Way, a book by French author Henri Raczymow that recently appeared in English translation, is a probing literary inquiry into a once-celebrated Jewish dandy in late 19th-century French society that Marcel Proust used as his model for Charles Swann, a major character in his famous novel Remembrance of Things Past (A la recherche du temps perdu).

Raczymow, who was in Toronto recently to read at the International Festival of Authors, explained that the model for Proust's character was Charles Haas (1832-1902), a prominent Parisian socialite now largely forgotten.

"Proust was fascinated by him because he was very handsome and because he had a lot of success with the aristocracy and with women," Raczymow said in an interview with The CJN.

"Proust was very jealous of him and took his revenge by writing about him. In the novel, Proust's narrator is very ambivalent about Swann, at one point by admiring him and at another by making him ugly."

Setting out to write a biography of Haas, Raczymow found few worthy biographical sources. One of his biggest coups was in locating a great-great-granddaughter of the elusive figure.

"To find anything of Haas was very difficult. I was like a detective, looking for traces. This man was famous in his time but nothing remains of him because he didn't do anything – he didn't write and he wasn't an artist. Except for what Proust has done in his novel, one can find only tiny traces of him."

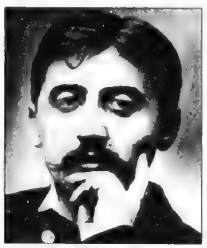
Swan's Way "is a comparison between the real Charles Haas and the fictive Charles Swann," the author said. "It's an inquiry. It's also a journal of the inquiry itself – and maybe it's an impossible inquiry for the reason I said before, because this character in reality is very insignificant, contrary to what Proust did with him in the novel."

Haas was apparently typical of many French Jews of the period who wanted their Jewishness to be invisible in society. Many preferred the label "Israelite" rather than Jew, Raczymow said.

French Jews of the late 19th century, including Albert Dreyfus, "were 'juives honteux,'" he said. "That means they were ashamed to be Jews. They had become too liberal and too assimilated. They were French outside and Jews at home."

Published in installments beginning in 1914, Proust's massive, multi-volumed novel remains requisite reading on university campuses because of the advances he brought to the novelist's art, essentially achieving in literature what the impressionists were achieving in the visual arts. His obsessions with time, memory, sensation and illusion added modern psychological filters to narrative techniques that earlier storytellers such as Balzac and Dickens hadn't developed.

Proust excels at revealing myriad complex and often contradictory facets of character. Raczymow likens the effect to "a cubist painting by Picasso so that you can see all aspects of a person, and you can even see behind him."



Marcel Proust

In some ways, Raczymow uses similar impressionistic devices in Swan's Way. Part novel and part essay, the book begins as a literary meditation but turns a corner and becomes an investigation.

Explaining that he likes to build upon another writer's fictive creations as if they were real, Raczymow described his book as an exploration of the gap between fiction and reality.

"What impressed me was the emptiness of the historical character of Charles Haas, as compared to the magnificent portrait that Proust had done of him as Swann."

Because Proust drew several vivid Jewish portraits, he has in effect given us "a total sociology of the Jewish community in Paris between 1870 and 1920," Raczymow said.

Proust's mother was Jewish but he "lived and died as a Catholic, so he had nothing Jewish about him. But he used to know about his maternal branch, he knew the Bible, and he knew very well the Jewish milieu."

Raczymow, a teacher at a Jewish high school in a Paris suburb, said that being Jewish in France "is not as bad" as recent news reports might suggest. The recent wave of anti-Semitic attacks emanates mainly from disaffected Arab youths in the Paris suburbs who originated in Tunisia and Algeria, he said.

"It's not the French: it's not the government, it's not the papers, it's not the television, it's not the society," he said. "It's a little part of the Mahgrebic French Arabic community. These people feel they are excluded from the work, from the richness of French society, and they accuse the Jews of preventing their success. They are very anti-Semitic."

Translated by Robert Bononno, Swan's Way is published by Northwestern University Press.

Producers resounds with vaudevillian gags, borscht belt routines

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

It's been more than 40 years since comedy writer Mel Brooks first conceived of the idea for what would become The Producers, the $10-million musical that opened recently at Toronto's Canon Theatre, courtesy of real-life theatre producers Ed and David Mirvish.

In town for the opening, Brooks appeared on stage at the show's curtain to thank the appreciative audience as well as the wonderful players.

The cast is headlined by Sean Cullen, who shines as the shady theatrical producer Max Bialystock, exuding a stage charisma reminiscent of Zero Mostel or Jackie Gleason. Michael Therriault is outstanding as the nervous accountant Leo Bloom, a perfect foil to Bialystock.

The sets and multiple set changes are also highly impressive, as is Susan Stroman's direction and choreography. Brooks, who penned the book with Thomas Mechan, also wrote the music and witty lyrics for this patently over-the-top musical, which has been the hottest ticket in New York since opening there with Nathan Lane and Matthew Broderick 2-1/2 years ago.

The creator of such comedy classics as The 2,000 Year Old Man, Get Smart, Blazing Saddles, Young Frankenstein and High Anxiety, Brooks won an Oscar for best screenplay for the original 1968 film version of The Producers, which he wrote expressly for Mostel and Gene Wilder.

He had been fiddling with the catchy premise as early as 1961. The action is sparked when Bialystock, picking up on an innocent remark by Bloom, realizes he can make more money with a flop than with a hit. Together they set out to produce a magnificent failure that will fold on opening night, leaving them with a huge surplus of investors' capital. The plan is ruined when their sure-fire theatrical failure becomes a smash hit.

Titled Springtime for Hitler – A Gay Romp with Adolph and Eva at Berchtesgaden, the play within a play is in such outrageously bad taste that it's laughable.

How bad is bad? Picture a chorus line of prancing Nazi SS officers in full regalia, dancing in a swastika formation visible only by a huge inverted overhead mirror. Picture a campy Adolf Hitler, delivering a high-kitsch production number straight out of a Busby Berkeley musical. Imagine insipid lyrics like "Don't be stupid, be a smarty / Come and join the Nazi party."

No matter how much The Producers will make you laugh, it will also make you squirm. No one who truly understands the meaning of a swastika can possibly surrender completely to the laughter. "Oh, loosen up!" you will tell yourself, but some uneasiness will remain: it is at the core of the humour.

Brooks is doing much more than satirizing modern audiences and their capricious tastes. He's also goose-stepping gleefully through the forbidden garden of political incorrectness long before the term was invented.

When he first told friends he was writing a comedy called Springtime for Hitler – its original title – they "tried to laugh it off as just another outre Brooks gag," according to his biographer, William Holzman. "Springtime for Hitler!" a friend warned him. "You can't say things like that, Mel – the audience will throw stones at you."

Back in '67, no studio would invest in the project and Brooks was repeatedly told that "perhaps not all America would find Nazis to be the marvelously wry comic foils [you] found them to be." The film owes its existence to an independent backer – Jewish – who collapsed in laughter when Brooks read him an outline.

(Jewish audiences seem especially enthralled by his brand of comic irreverence. In Toronto, the Reena Foundation, the Bathurst Street JCC and the State of Israel Bonds were among many organizations to host well-attended fund-raising events around the opening.)

Like a court jester who ridicules the king, Brooks gets away with it, perhaps because he's an equal-opportunity offender. He pokes fun at crass producers, audiences, romantic comedy, Jews, women, the elderly, homosexuals and Nazis – who receive the brunt of the ridicule.

Like the film, the musical resounds with vaudevillean gags and borscht-belt routines, and becomes increasingly frenetic as it descends from satire into farce and burlesque. Unlike the film, it offers a happy ending in which Max and Leo, jailed for fraud, attain early parole and make a triumphant return to Broadway.

What is one supposed to make of Brooks' madcap, topsy-turvy world, in which the world's most evil figure (Hitler) is elevated to the very pinnacle of glittering celebrity and adulation, while more ordinary souls (Bialystock and Bloom) descend into a dank prison netherworld?

That is a question to ponder while laughing, and perhaps occasionally squirming, through this entertaining production.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

KEEPING KOSHER ON KILIMANJARO

Jerusalemite Yedidya Fraiman, an experienced international mountain trekker, has started a trekking company called Koshertreks, which organizes and leads treks to extraordinary destinations for people who keep kosher.

The treks are multi-day hikes in the mountains that do not require any technical skill, only a reasonable degree of health and fitness.

The treks are assessed as to their level of difficulty. The easiest involve three to five hours of trekking a day, with elevation gains of up to 1,000 feet, and many are suitable for the whole family. The more demanding involve six to eight hours daily with elevation gains of up to 2,000 feet and participants must be in very good physical condition.

Trekkers generally travel light and carry their personal provisions in a backpack. They practice self-reliance, show respect for their surroundings, and sleep in mountain lodges, hostels or tents.

Fraiman started Koshertreks with fellow Jerusalemite Mordy Hurwich-Kehat after realizing the difficulties of observing kashrut and Shabbat on most commercial treks. "Many among the kosher-observant community likely don't even consider trekking due to the various halachic issues involved," he explains.

Thus Fraiman saw the need for a kosher operator to step in "with the mission of handling all the halachic logistics in a way that would open up the great mountain passages to kashrut-observers."

Destinations include Kilimanjaro in Tanzania, Everest in Nepal, the Dolomites in Italy, the Otter Trail in South Africa, and the Great Glen Way in Scotland. The group carries much of its own food as well as cooking utensils and even poles and fishing line so as to construct its own eruv, or halachic fence, around its stationary camp on Shabbat.

"As our name indicates, we take kashrut seriously. We believe that keeping kosher should not prevent us from seeing the world, and that seeing the world should not prevent us from keeping kosher."

Kehat is scheduled to make presentations in Toronto and Montreal on Jan. 27 and 28 respectively. E-mail info@koshertreks.com, or visit www.koshertreks.com.

Caribbean Resort Goes Kosher: ClubKosher.com is an American tour company that gives kosher guests the opportunity to enjoy all-inclusive tropical paradise resorts worldwide.

Managing director Daniel Levine says Occidental's four-star Playa Grande Beach and Golf Resort in Puerto Plata, Dominican Republic, has gone completely kosher, a first for an entire Caribbean resort. Visitors can enjoy gourmet kosher meals in all five of its restaurants, which range from upscale to informal. Every snack and drink at the resort is kosher.

"Guests may eat formally one night in the resort's Steak House and just 'nosh' the next day with a poolside barbecue," Levine says. "It will be a pleasure having the variety, and never have to worry about the religious concerns."

ClubKosher presents its annual winter family vacation plan with 7- to 10-night stays at the Playa Grande, Jan. 15 to 25. It also offers a Passover program at the five-star Gran Melia Resort in Cancun. 203-799-7791. E-mail, ClubKosher @aol.com. Or visit www.clubkosher.com

Red Sea Partnership: Israeli Tourism Minister Benny Elon and Aqaba Governor Akel Biltaji recently visited Red Sea resort twins Eilat and Aqaba to announce that their two countries have decided to jointly market their popular tourist havens, which are the southernmost cities in Israel and Jordan, respectively.

"These two cities can be a bridge to peace between our two countries," Biltaji said, agreeing with Elon that tourism "is the key to peaceful relations."

New CDs feature Israeli singer-songwriters

By VIVA PRESS
Special to The CJN

Inside Looking Out, by Various Artists (NMC)

One of the most interesting albums to hit record stores lately is Inside Looking Out – a collection of Israel's best English-language singer-songwriters. Yes, they exist. And they are admirable.

This 13-track album gives an insider's peek into the underground/independent music scene in this country.

In an industry where most singers rely on someone else to write and/or compose their music, it is often difficult to find Israel's current Bob Dylans and Leonard Cohens. Inside Looking Out found 13 of them, most of whom – including Hadara Levin Areddy, Lenses, Jay Walk Snail, Gospel Zombie and Shrugged – are all but unknown to the general public.

The two most popular artists on the disc are Lenses (Nazareth-born, Be'er Sheva-based Juwan Spady) and Israeli-born, American-raised Hadara Levin Areddy (named the critics' favourite singer/songwriter of 2001).

Areddy – who came onto the scene in 2000 and quickly gathered a crowd of zealous fans – has been described by critics as a crazy mix of Janis Joplin, Tom Waits and Joni Mitchell. She calls her style "kick-blue-rock-'n-soul."

On the disc, we're treated to the bluesy-jazzy-funky Music makes no sense, origi-

FILM SOCIETY TO SHOW TROUBLING DOCUMENTARY ABOUT ANTI-ISRAEL BIAS IN FRENCH MEDIA

The Toronto Jewish Film Society and Hillel present the provocative and troubling French documentary Decryptage (Decoding), in which director Jacques Tarnero examines the French media's persistent bias against Israel in its coverage of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. Made in 2002, the film includes footage showing "how Palestinian children are educated to hate Israel and Jews."

Miles Nadal JCC, Al Green Theatre. Sunday Jan. 18, 2004. 4 and 7 p.m. $12, JCC members, $10. Single tickets go on sale 15 minutes before each screening. 416-924-6211, ext. 111.

Names in the News: A former employee of a New York literary agency has penned a memoir revealing new details about J. D. Salinger, the highly reclusive writer who lives in a New Hampshire town. Jaime Clarke's book O What Fun We'll Have! O The Times! is apparently the latest in a series of show-and-tell books by people keen on capitalizing on their privileged encounters with the legendary author of Catcher in the Rye, Nine Stories, Franny and Zooey, and Raise High the Roofbeams, Carpenters!

This unusual book may shock you, will make you laugh, and may break your heart — but you will never forget it
A SIGNET BOOK

By opening the mail each day at the agency, Clarke came to learn much about Salinger's quiet life. The New York media has been filled in recent days with details and leaks from the manuscript, which is not yet published.

Contrary to persistent rumour, Salinger "is not sitting on a wealth of manuscripts to be published after his death," the snoop relates. Long opposed to any Hollywood treatment of his works, Salinger was reportedly approached by Jeffrey Katzenberg of DreamWorks Studio for the film rights to Catcher in the Rye. Katzenberg even promised his partner, Steven Spielberg, as director. Producer Harvey Weinstein also made a purchase offer, but, like Katzenberg, was turned down.

Clarke spoke only once by telephone to Salinger, who apparently avoids the phone because he is hard of hearing. But in 1998, he called Clarke to demand that his agent stop a scheduled screening of an unauthorized Iranian film adaptation of his 1961 novelette, Franny and Zooey, at the Lincoln Center. Salinger's lawyer got the screening cancelled. Now Salinger is probably wondering why he can't do the same with the forthcoming book.

Grants for Visual Artists: UJA Federation's Toronto Jewish Arts Council is offering five grants to visual artists, each worth $5,000. To be eligible, an artist must be Jewish or his or her work must have a Jewish theme.

Worth $25,000 in total, the newly established program "will help artists explore Judaism through their work, which will enrich not only Toronto's Jewish community but the city as a whole," said chairperson Cyrel Troster.

Grants are scheduled to be distributed in April. Applications are available from Cheryl Landy, cultural services coordinator, UJA Federation, 416-635-2883, ext. 265; e-mail clandy@ujafed.org. Deadline is Tuesday Feb. 10.

Hamlet, Home Version: Paul Rudnick's play I Hate Hamlet has a truly promising premise: a group of actors rehearse a production of Shakespeare's most famous play in the gothic apartment of the late, great actor John Barrymore – whose ghost appears in full costume. A battle of wits and swords ensues. Presented by Markham Little Theatre, 171 Town Centre Blvd. Adults $20. Feb. 11 to 14. 905-305-SHOW (7469).

CJN Profile

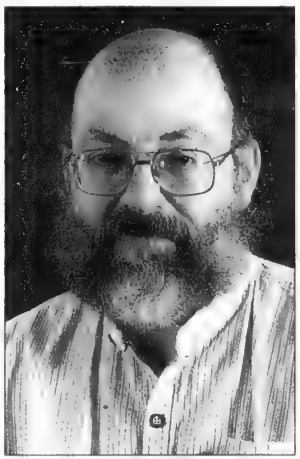
Science fiction author is the master of alternate universes

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

Imagine if the Nazis won World War II and conquered the globe. How would any Jews who survived that calamity live in such a world?

It's a horrible thing to contemplate, of course, but ideas that twist history into new, strange shapes are the stock in trade of Harry Turtledove, who at 54 is one of today's most prolific and popular science fiction writers.

His latest novel, In the Presence of Mine Enemies (New American Library), chronicles the goings-on in an alternate Berlin of 2010, where a new Fuehrer, Heinz Buckliger, has just come to power.



Harry Turtledove

Like Mikhail Gorbachev in the former Soviet Union, Buckliger's radical ideas and changes threaten to overthrow the old order. For the Jews, residing under Aryan identities in Berlin, his actions may improve their lot, but they're skeptical that nearly a century of indoctrinated hatred of Jews can be easily erased.

In the Presence of Mine Enemies follows a few of those Jews – the new Marranos – in their day-to-day lives, in which even passing on their scant knowledge of Judaism to their children can endanger their very existence, should the word of who they really are get out.

(The book is not the first one to play with the "What if the Nazis won World War II?" scenario – Turtledove cites Sarban's The Sound of His Horn (1952) and Philip K. Dick's The Man in the High Castle (1962) as his two favourites of the mini-genre. But it is the first to be written solely from a Jewish point of view.)

The novel spends a lot of time on the inner workings of its 21st century Greater German Reich, a modern, technologically advanced empire, yet one that is also very old-fashioned in its social mores, frowning on divorce, not to mention infidelity and abortion.

That attention to anthropological detail is perhaps what distinguishes Turtledove most from other practitioners of alternate history.

"I have a doctorate in Byzantine history. Do you want fries with that," he jokes.

"[My] research [for this book] included things on the way the Third Reich worked, on the collapse of the Soviet Union that I was paralleling, on Marranos, on the last Jews in Berlin during World War II, on people suddenly discovering themselves to be Jewish – which has also, though I didn't know it when I was writing, happened to a friend of mine – things of that sort.

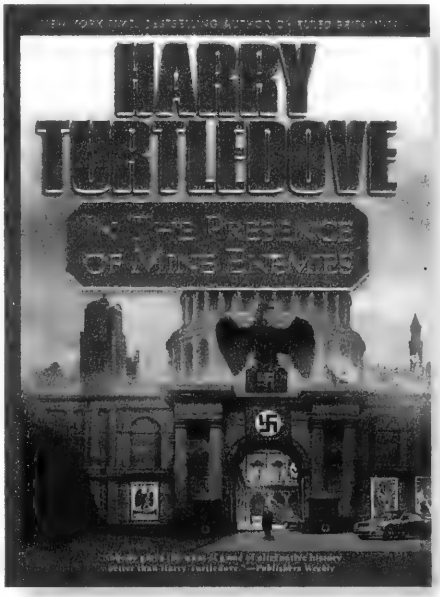
"I figured a victorious Reich would stay conservative socially — [it] seemed reasonable, given the 'Kitchen, Church, and Children' Nazi ideology."

In the Presence of Mine Enemies, which originated as a short story by the same name and is part of the collection of stories in his anthology Departures, is not Turtledove's only book with Jewish content.

Mordechai Anielewicz, the legendary leader of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, is a protagonist in the writer's Worldwar series, which considers what would have happened if a race of lizard-like extraterrestrials invaded Earth in the middle of World War II.

Jewish characters also pop up in Turtledove's ambitious and detailed Great War and American Empire books, which continue his alternate history about the South winning the U.S. Civil War that he first explored in his acclaimed, prize-winning novel How Few Remain.

But the most chilling of his Jewish-tinged tales is the short story Next Year in Jerusalem, which appears in the anthology, Imaginings: An Anthology of Long Short Fiction. It's set a few generations in the future, when Israel is no more and a group of Argentine–raised Jews calling themselves the Second Irgun attempt to provoke their fellow Jews in Arab-ruled Palestine to rise up against their oppressors.



Does that story say anything about Turtledove's own beliefs about Israel's future?

"Well, if you're small and in a place where all your neighbors hate you, your odds for long-term survival – say over several hundred years – could be better. You can win and win and win, and all you win is the chance to fight again somewhere down the line. Lose once…"

As for his frequent insertion of Jewish characters in his novels, that's a natural fit, Turtledove says. "I am Jewish, though not particularly observant. It would be surprising if I didn't have that perspective and put some of it into what I write."

Last year saw a batch of critically praised alternate history novels, including, most notably, Kim Stanley Robinson's The Years of Rice and Salt, in which the Black Plague wiped out 90 per cent of Europe instead of the 30 per cent it actually did, and Steven Barnes' Lion's Blood, which conceived of a 19th century America ruled by Muslim slave traders and Irishmen kidnapped as slaves.

Does this represent a sea change in the amount and quality of alternate history science fiction, and has Turtledove's success had anything to do with it?

"My guess is that it's a blip but that's only a guess. I've had a couple of people tell me lately that I've helped put alternate history more on the publishing map that it was. I don't know that I believe it's so. It's certainly flattering to hear."

His own intent in his writing is simple, he says.

"My first goal is to keep readers interested enough to go on turning pages. Absent that, all else fails. If I can make them think a little and maybe even teach them a little along with entertaining them, that's a pleasant bonus."

Sonny Goldstein, CFP

USDS TAKES CENTRE ICE: On the night of Dec. 8, United Synagogue Day School families headed downtown for a very different kind of fundraiser. Over 800 moms, dads, students, teachers, administration staff, and volunteers filtered into the Air Canada Centre for the first-ever USDS Family Skate. Alongside Toronto Maple Leafs' mascot Carlton the Bear and special guest, former defenseman Mike Pelyk, families had a unique opportunity to skate on the Leafs' home ice. One of the evening's highlights was when Canadian Paralympics Hockey Goalie Paul Rosen joined Pelyk on the rink and then introduced the members of the school's hockey teams on centre-ice. Final score with lots of assists and no penalties or overtime was $25,000!

Act now – it's your life

I recently read a Toronto Star article that was part of a series about the bleak living conditions seniors are experiencing in Ontario nursing homes. Perhaps you also read it. The images of neglect and loneliness it described continue to disturb me.

Judaism teaches us that we are supposed to honour our elders. After all, they are the ones who raised, fed, clothed, educated, mentored and loved us. They sacrificed so much for us. They helped shape who we are today, and their life experiences have imbued them with a wisdom that we have yet to gain.

By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

With those thoughts in mind, I read the article with a deep sadness about the plight of our seniors and a determination to take charge of my future.

There are three ways we can do this: plan for our financial future and our retirement, take care of our health now (so as to preclude any future dependence on a seniors' residence) and pray (since, ultimately, He decides everything). These three things will prevent, or delay, our decline into such an existence as was described in that rousing article.

We can't take our health and well-being for granted. We have to do what it takes to maintain our physical, mental and spiritual health. We must be proactive in preventing illness. True, most of us are very busy and feel justified in excusing ourselves from any commitment to fitness or intellectual/spiritual pursuits. But as time passes, if we don't have a fitness regimen and some sort of regular intellectual/spiritual stimulation, our bodies, minds, energy levels and outlooks will begin to deteriorate.

It is imperative that we review our eating habits and be mindful of our food selections. We must choose wholesome foods that nourish our bodies, remembering that our body is a gift, and that it is our duty to guard and maintain its health.

Our minds require intellectual stimulation in order to stay sharp, lucid and alert. It's a good idea to attend interesting lectures, take up a hobby or pursue a goal that we always intended to accomplish but never did.

We should also choose a physical activity that we enjoy and schedule it for the same time every day. We select a form of exercise that is practical and feasible for us to stick with – something that fits in with our current lifestyle.

In my case, although I love to swim and used to swim laps regularly, I am now at a different stage in my life with four young children and I find regular swimming too time-consuming. Instead, since I love the outdoors, I step outside six days a week (regardless of the weather) into my own outdoor gym. The sidewalk is my running track and the trees and curb are my stretching aids. And since I enjoy it so much, if there is a day that I don't work out, I feel that something is missing.

Finally, we must build up our spirit. Let's fill our lives with music that we enjoy, establish meaningful relationships with our loved ones and nurture a connection with our Creator.

In so doing, we will enhance and invigorate our journey through this life that He has blessed us with, and we will use all that is in our power to pursue our lives with satisfaction, contentment and purpose.

I hope to be fit, healthy, alert and responsible for my life for many, many more years. Don't you? Let's act now.

New CDs feature Israeli singer-songwriters

nally from the mini-album Magic Time.

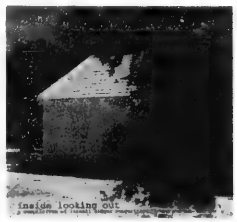
Adam Lee Rosenfeld, also known as Gospel Zombie, presents a driving acoustic sound on Feel Much Better.

Oren Lahav, also known as Jay Walk Snail, mixes folk and acoustic grooves with soft vocals on All I wanted was to call Indiana. Lahav has been compared to the late folk-punk singer/songwriter Elliott Smith.

Three-piece Shrugged – Ohad Ezer (words, music, guitars, vocals), Nir Gavis (drums) and Omri Chetrit (bass) – produce a solid sound and can best be described as a mix of the Dave Matthews Band and 54-40. Their song June is an exquisite blend of rock and folk.



From rock to funk to jazz to folk, there's a smattering of styles on this disc, and overall, the singer-songwriters challenge and excite. This album is an excellent introduction to the lesser-known but proficient musicians on the Israeli scene.

Shachar Even-Tsur, by Irumim (Hed Arzi)

Shachar Even-Tsur's newest project, Irumim, is good, solid Israeli rock. Even-Tsur proves his crackerjack guitar-playing ability on the CD's 12 tracks, especially on the opening song, 2052 Dvora.

The 31-year-old singer/musician wrote all the songs, and a closer look at the lyrics gives an insight into his offbeat sense of humour and satirical outlook. He covers a range of topics from love to war to consumerism.

In the addictive hit, Irumim, for example, Even-Tsur pokes fun at society's obsession with consumerism and notes what a shame it is that "everyone has the same clothes" and thus "it's too bad we can't walk around naked."

Even-Tsur's past success with rock band Monica Sex, of which he is a founding member, has enabled him to produce a strong debut solo album. His melodies are also a throwback to his alternative rock band, 527, which he started while living in New York from 1995 to 2000.

These CDs are available at http://www.israel-music.com (English site); www.mitos.co.il (Hebrew site); www.nmc-music.co.il (Hebrew and English site); or stores that sell Israeli products.

Rubenstein traces Weir's road to the Masters

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When he was a young man growing up in a small town near Sarnia, Mike Weir had a passion for sports. He loved hockey – no surprise – baseball and golf.

A small and wiry guy, Weir was never really much more than a dabbler in the great Canadian winter obsession. But golf, that was another matter. A hard worker and fierce competitor impelled by an insatiable desire to succeed, Weir has reached a level of achievement in golf that has been matched in Canada by, well, nobody.

The first Canadian winner of the Masters tournament, Weir was named recipient of the Lou Marsh Trophy as Canada's outstanding athlete in 2003, as determined by a select panel of sports writers and editors.

With $4.92 million (US) in earnings this year, winner of three tournaments in all, a member of the international side in the Presidents Cup, Weir recently wound up his best year by far on the PGA Tour.

The left-hander could well be considered the best male Canadian golfer ever, exceeding the accomplishments of even the legendary George Knudson, whose best finish at the Masters was second in 1969. Still only 33, Weir's best years are ahead of him.

Weir's rise from obsessive teen whacking balls at the Huron Oaks Golf Club in his hometown of Brights Grove to the PGA tour is told in fascinating detail in Lorne Rubenstein's new book, Mike Weir: The Road to the Masters (McClelland and Stewart). Rubenstein, golf writer for the Globe and Mail, has been following Weir since he was a kid winning local and regional tournaments and earning a golf scholarship at Brigham Young University in Utah.

After watching Weir win two tournaments early in the 2003 season, Rubenstein received Weir's permission to follow him through the PGA tour in his struggle to win his first-ever major. Fortuitously for Rubenstein, he didn't have to wait too long, as Weir was in contention early at the first major of the year, the Masters. In the final twosome on Sunday, Weir sunk an excruciatingly nerve-wracking "career-defining" seven-foot putt on the 18th to force a playoff. He went on to defeat Len Mattiace in the first playoff hole.

Played in April at the Augusta National Golf Club, the Masters has become more than a simple tournament, even if a major. More like a rite of spring, the Masters awes viewers on TV and "patrons" on the course with its stunning beauty, its mystique, its history and its difficulty.

While the other three majors – the U.S. Open, the British Open and the PGA Championship – rotate among top courses, the Masters is always played at the same exclusive club in Georgia. The Masters' special aura has been tainted somewhat in recent years over controversy over that very exclusivity. It opened itself to black members only a little more than 10 years ago and it was the subject of a protest by feminist activists in 2003 over its refusal to accept women members.

Still, with its links to great moments in golf history and to the great Bobby Jones, who helped found the club, the Masters at Augusta retains its special cachet. So if winning a major is a monumental accomplishment, winning the Masters provides just that extra luster.

Rubenstein, as knowledgeable a golf writer as there is in this country, tells the story of the Masters as well as the story of Weir's rise to excellence. We learn as much about Weir as we could possibly want to know – his drive, his ambition, his polite Canadian demeanour, his friendship with hockey stars Wayne Gretzky and Adam Oates – and we learn much about the tournament, PGA players, the course and what it takes to be a champion golfer. The technical aspects to Weir's game – his work on his grip, his swing, as well as his effort to focus his thoughts on positive results – are part of the story.

Like baseball in the United States and hockey in Canada, golf possesses another level to it, a mystical, character-defining aspect. A student of the game and its lore, Rubenstein tells that story well.

Documentary looks at role of Jews in basketball history

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

From humble beginnings early in the last century, basketball now ranks as one of the world's favourite sports spectacles.

Early in its history, however, basketball was the sport of the outsider, of the young urban dweller who felt excluded from more polite and accepted American pastimes, such as baseball.

Played in city playgrounds, sometimes with only a peach basket hooked up to a light pole and with rolled up newspaper to serve as a ball, the sport featured a prominent core of Jewish stars.

Many of those stars of school gyms and street corner hoops are still around, as filmmaker Leon Gast found in researching I Love, a documentary recently released on DVD that examines the history of basketball.

Gast, who also directed the Academy Award-winning 1996 film When We Were Kings about the 1974 title fight between Muhammad Ali and George Foreman, interviewed a cohort of Jewish players ranging in age from 72 to 94.

He found many of those hoops veterans together in – where else? – a deli in Florida, where they gather every Tuesday to talk hoops and reminisce about their glory days.

Back in the 1920s, '30s and '40s, Jews were the dominant ethnic group in basketball, often even playing for church teams and at Catholic schools.

Although they often had to put up with anti-Jewish prejudice, they still managed to dominate their sport. The South Philadelphia Hebrew Association SPHAs (pronounced spas) were one of basketball's original pro teams, and one of its most successful.

Among the onetime hoops stars interviewed for the film are Jerry Fleishman, who played for the NBA's Philadelphia Warriors from 1946 to 1953; Hy Gotkin, St. John's University all-American, 1944-45; Norm Drucker, a player with New York's City College and later chief referee of the NBA; Sol "Butch" Schwartz, Long Island University 1939-40; Yakov Kleinman, one of of five Jewish players – the Wonder Five – on the 1926 St. John's college team.

Ossie Schectman, along with Stan Stutz, Ralph Kaplowitz, and Leo "Ace" Gottlieb were all members of the first ever New York Knicks team. Schectman holds the distinction of scoring the first basket in NBA history in the league's opening game in 1946 between the Knicks and the Toronto Huskies.

Another important Jewish pioneer, Abe Saperstein, went on to found and own the famed Harlem Globetrotters.

I Love goes on to examine the growth of basketball in black communities, particularly the street games that still attract spectators by the hundreds and its evolution into today's hip hop sports culture.

With interviews with Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, Allen Iverson and Phil Jackson among many, I Love presents a fascinating look at the game, its heroes and its place in American culture.

For more information about the Jewish influence on the sport, check out this past CJN story online: www.cjnews.com/pastissues/01/july12-01/sports/sports1.htm.

A Jewish army in Toronto

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

A non-Jewish friend recently asked me why Diaspora Jews don't do a better job defending themselves against anti-Semitism. Why don't we?

In the past, I've written about the need for Jewish community members to play a role in fighting anti-Semitism. I proposed that every Jew combat anti-Semitism, whether it be in their workplace, neighbourhood or in their travels. Such an approach would put the responsibility of our existence where it belongs – in the laps of the Jewish people – and it would ensure that all Jews are ambassadors of Israel. Here are some ideas.

• Ve'ahavta, the organization I direct, is developing a collective strategy with other Jewish non-governmental agencies (NGOs) to create stronger alliances among non-Jewish NGOs worldwide. This is especially important since the disgusting debacle that occurred two years ago at the United Nations World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, where the main agenda item was an attack on Israel. We weren't prepared to fight and were brutally knocked out in the first round. If you are part of a professional group or alliance, use that forum to represent the Jewish people and Israel in a positive light. Co-ordinate an Israel mission for your friends and/or colleagues. Local Jewish student organizations recently sent non-Jewish university activists to Israel to learn about it firsthand. This is not apologetic. It is smart!

• Develop Jewish hasbarah (explanation) workshops in your neighbourhood or through your syngagogue. The group should be small and manageable. Each member should have their own area of expertise, such as an understanding of Judaism, the ability to articulate ideas and marketing skills. Invite people of all ethnicities to your home or synagogue for an interactive evening with the goal of educating one another about each others' backgrounds. Break down stereotypes. Show them. Judaism fascinates many non-Jews.

• To represent the Jewish people, you must know what it means to be Jewish. Discover your own identity. Let's become the people of the Book again. Start a Jewish book club or learning workshop. Read. Drop by Israel's bookstore and ask the owner, Izzy, what books to read. He has a great grasp of Jewish literature.

UJA Federation and B'nai Brith have the resources and infrastructure to help create this Jewish army of sorts. Wouldn't a community fund to finance this movement be incredible? Rabbis would also be key to its success. Ask them for help and guidance. Ask your rabbi to spearhead a hasbarah workshop of his or her own and use it as a template for others. So many shul-goers are marketers and have the resources to spread the message if only they were asked. We don't ask. Why?

The elder members of our community could be key players in the development of this idea. Let's be creative and at the same time give many older people a purpose and an important role in the future of our people.

The Jews of Canada live in one of the friendliest, safest nations in the world. Despite this, we have shown a quiet, cowardly approach to fighting on our own behalf. Imagine how scary this battle must be in France, where it is dangerous to wear a kippah in the street. The dynamics of our city not only allow for us to make huge strides in this area, but beg us to do so.

Don't be afraid. Don't be quiet. And don't stay home and drink and eat heartily when the community is suffering. That is not Jewish.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I lost my mother to cancer last March and although I am not observant, I am trying to go through this year without going to any parties or festive celebrations. I think this is the least I can do to honour my mother. I know she would have wanted this. I have even paid someone for the year to say Kaddish every day. I myself say my own little prayers all the time.

This is a very difficult season for me. Neither my business nor my social circle is overly Jewish and I have had to decline many invitations to both Christmas and New Year's parties. I am a single woman and parties are usually very much a part of my life. I unwind, regroup and network.

When I RSVP my regrets, I'm picking up some uncomfortable vibes. Although I've made a commitment, I'm feeling left out and a little sorry for myself.

No Parties For Me

Dear No Parties For Me,

There is nothing more powerful than the bond between a mother and daughter.

Avelut is the final period of mourning observed only for a parent. It lasts for one year after the burial. I commend you on following your heart and your mother's wishes. It may seem difficult to follow this Jewish custom, especially at this time of year given your lifestyle. However, I have no doubt that you will fulfil this undertaking. You are obviously a strong woman with strong convictions.

Feeling sorry for yourself right now is real, but it will be very short-lived. When this season is over, you will come out on the other side feeling empowered that you were able to get through it, and proud that you have not let yourself or your mother down.

As for the uncomfortable vibes you are feeling, it is very likely that people are saddened by not being able to celebrate with you. In a week from now no, one will remember this. It will be business as usual and life will go on. If you feel you need to explain yourself, the truth goes a long way.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN., email: eb@cjnews.com. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

New advocacy agency names CEO

Hershell Ezrin to head CIJA

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Hershell Ezrin has been named chief executive officer of a new community organization that will co-ordinate Jewish and Israel advocacy efforts in domestic politics and on campuses.

Ezrin will take over as CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) in early January and will hold the post for the next few years. At the same time, he will resign from his position as chair and CEO of GPC International, a policy consultant company that played a key role in the restructuring efforts leading to CIJA's creation.

"I'm doing it for the really simple reason that when you grow up with the name 'Hershell' and you don't change it, it's easy to understand what's going on around you," Ezrin said.

"It's a harsher time for Jews," he said, noting that the manifestations of anti-Semitism in recent years remind him of his own experiences as a youth when Jews faced frequent discrimination.

CIJA will attempt to address growing anti-Semitism and anti-Israel agitation on campuses while also introducing issues of concern to the Jewish community onto the national agenda, Ezrin said.

"I think it's so important, I'm prepared to devote myself to it. I believe it's important to do and we have the tools and the capacity to

98-year-old stresses positive thinking

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

"If you have your health," says 98-year-old Kurt Eisenberg, "there are no obstacles. Good health means the basic for happiness."

Interviewed in his Two Neptune condominium where he lives alone, Eisenberg's walls are filled with shelves of photo albums and awards for the many voluntary and fundraising activities he used to participate in.

Today, Eisenberg is an active resident of Two Neptune, teaching advanced bridge and acting as a piano accompanist for performances. He said he began teaching bridge back in South Africa to earn extra money for his family and to raise money for B'nai Brith.

Despite his age, he remains optimistic about life.

"I do not take any medication and I have a sense of humour," he said.

He continues to do his own shopping, go for walks and attend concerts, travelling by bus and subway.

Born in Dortmund, Germany, in 1905, Eisenberg moved with his family to Berlin when he was five years old. In 1936, he decided to leave Germany for South Africa when he realized that Hitler and the rise in anti-Semitism were creating great dangers for the Jews.

But it was difficult for German Jews to enter other countries, he said.

"At that time, there were only two countries open to Jews – South Africa and South America. I chose South Africa because, as part of the British Commonwealth, the language spoken there was English and I had studied basic English at school."

He added, "Many people had the impression that Jews could not get out of Germany. That's not so.

Those who thought things would get better stayed and most eventually perished."

Eisenberg said he has only one friend left from his youth in Germany. She lives in Australia. "We still communicate by telephone and I can remember her sweet-16 birthday in Berlin. In those days, we made friends and the friendships stuck."

Eisenberg lived in South Africa for 50 years before coming to Canada, where his older son Brian and his family lived. (They have since moved to England.) He also has a son Norman who lives in San Francisco.

In 1990, Eisenberg began writing his biography for his children and grandchildren. In the 95-page book, he writes of his early years in Germany and recalls World War I.

"I remember seeing Kaiser Wilhelm riding with his cavalry in Berlin. Both my grandfathers fought in the Prussian wars."

His descriptions of the events in South Africa for over half a century reflect the turbulent history of the times.

In Germany, Eisenberg had learned how to manufacture women's clothing as well as how to make chocolates. When he arrived in Johannesburg, he began manufacturing chocolates and also worked for an agency representing women's clothing manufacturers.

While in South Africa, Eisenberg joined the Johannesburg Symphony Orchestra, where he played the violin. He also participated in many community fundraising activities and was a president of B'nai Brith in Johannesburg.

In 1981, he retired from business. Three years later, his wife of 44 years, Hannelore, died. She had come alone to South Africa from Germany when she was 16.

Eisenberg said he and his wife liked to travel.

"After Hannelore died and I was retired, I would frequently take trips throughout the world. But today, I don't travel anymore."

Nevertheless, he is happy with his lot. Pointing to his head, he said, "This is still working." Pointing to his heart, he said, "And this is still working. Therefore, I have no complaints."

But above all, he stressed positive thinking.

"I always said I will be all right and I was all right."

Shalom-Salam: a calm in the campus storm

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Special Report

In the corridors of York University, Jonathan Moshevich has been called a Russian colonialist and a white European who doesn't belong on campus. The Jewish student, whose parents were born in Russia, has been insulted in Canada's two official languages – English and French.

And while the third-year political science student, who admits to being a Zionist, is willing to debate almost anyone on issues related to the Middle East, he turns away when suicide bombing is endorsed.

"I don't know what to say to someone who denies my right to live," Jonathan said in an interview at the York University Student Centre, where the multitude of clubs reflects the diversity of campus life. The day I was there, the Middle Eastern Students' Association was marketing tickets to its end-of-term party with Arabic music and posters of belly dancers.

Jonathan, who grew up in the Bathurst-Finch Russian corridor, describes the past three years at York as being "absolutely nuts," and the campus as a place where discussion about the Middle East has often regressed into hallway yell fests, with empty, angry polemics that only polarize students.

Although the situation has not reached the level of violence seen at Montreal's Concordia University two years ago, when pro-Palestinian demonstrators prevented former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu from speaking on campus, York has recently seen harsh protests on both sides of the Middle East debate. Last year, Muslim students at York demonstrated against the appearance of Middle East scholar Daniel Pipes and Jewish students opposed the appearance of academic Norman Finkelstein, author of The Holocaust Industry.

Yet, while campuses across Canada continue to experience anti-Israel tensions and supporters of the Jewish state feel marginalized, a small group has emerged at York that is trying to develop a forum for more civilized dialogue. The group, Shalom-Salam, now has almost 100 members.

Before the end of fall term, underneath balloons and peace banners depicting Israeli and Palestinian flags joined together with an image of a handshake, Shalom-Salam set up its first table at the university. Jewish kids wore Palestinian flags and Muslim students draped Israeli flags over their shoulders in an attempt to bring a level of humanity to the discussion.

"It was so refreshing," said Hina Kahn, one of the group's founders.

"People in the hallway were congratulating us. Professors walked by telling us to keep up the good work."

For students like Jonathan, who don't hide the fact they're Zionists, making Muslim friends at York University has been a challenge. Shalom-Salam has given him the opportunity to dialogue with students who consider themselves radicals, as well as with moderates.

As a Canadian-Israeli of Russian background, Jonathan understands the Jewish state's inherent right to defend itself. But he is also willing to criticize some Israeli policies.

"I understand there are two sides to this issue," he said. Part of his university experience has focused on meeting Palestinian supporters in order to see the conflict through their eyes.

Jonathan, who is a member of Shalom-Salam's executive, said the group is hoping to allow students on both sides to come together to hear each other's views.

Serving the Jewish people

From the editor's desk

The basic policy and purpose of The CJN, which we have occasionally noted in this space and is useful to state once again, "is to serve the Jewish people in Canada, in Israel and in all its habitations."

The re-iteration of that policy, at this time of year, is useful for editor and readers alike to help us measure how the paper is fulfilling its mandate.

The charge "to serve the Jewish people" informs every editorial decision we make. That is both a statement of fact and a promise. But, though a high and even noble directive, it is also vaguely defined, deliberately so on the part of the newspaper's board of directors. It allows the paper's countless daily editorial decisions to flow from the particular circumstances of each case at hand as well as from the editor's own approach to the issues.

Needless to say, there is a great deal of interpretative latitude built into the directive. And most of our readers, to be sure, would interpret how best "to serve the best interests of the Jewish people" far differently from the way I do.

The board of directors does, however, provide some guidance to the editor in applying the paper's policy: "The publishers proceed from the conviction that a better-informed Jewish community will be a healthier Jewish community. A healthy Canadian Jewish community is a great asset to Jewish communities in Israel and elsewhere and to society in Canada at large. The country at large and Jewish communities outside Canada have a stake in a Jewish community that is spiritually alive, intellectually alert, socially responsible and economically secure."

In other words, the paper's key overall objective is to help promote and achieve a Jewish community in Canada that is spiritually, intellectually, socially and economically thriving.

The way we do that is by providing our readers with the best information, commentary and opinions possible within the constraints of our resources and other limitations.

We take great pride in the paper. At the same time, however, we harbour no illusions that it is at or near perfection. Far from it. We are always striving to improve. We are always trying to make each page sing with its own special harmony. We are always trying to make the paper reach higher and further.

To that end, the paper is constantly evolving. It is always, in a profound sense, a work-in-progress. In the coming weeks, readers can look for the following changes in The CJN.

- Rabbi Dow Marmur, formerly the spiritual leader of Holy Blossom in Toronto, picks up the pen gently and gracefully set aside by Rabbi Gunther Plaut as a regular columnist.
- We will be adding a weekly page devoted to books and authors.
- Special features will appear more frequently. They will be longer, more investigative works.

Readers will also notice other additions and changes throughout the various sections of the paper, all of which, cumulatively, are aimed at enriching our journalistic offerings.

Some 40 months ago, the Jewish world was rocked by the Palestinian leadership's rejection of negotiation as the means of ending their conflict with Israel and their accompanying return to violence and terrorism. We thought that the other side wanted to arrive, finally, at peace, as earnestly as did Israel. But the facts have proven otherwise. Unfortunately, the consequences of the Palestinians' change in course have been many, all grievous but not all predictable.

Who among us would have foreseen the ominous triumphalism of radical Islam, the hold upon domestic European politics by Europe's burgeoning Muslim populations and the abject desensitization through the idolatry of "martyrization" of virtually an entire generation of Palestinian society?

It is not surprising that the news in The CJN – indeed, in every community newspaper throughout the Jewish world – has been dominated by "the situation" in Israel and the anti-Semitism in Europe. And rightly so. But there is – and must be – a great deal more to Jewish life in the year 2004 than monitoring, exposing and fighting the people and movements intent on harming Israel and Jews.

It is our obligation as a newspaper, as individuals, as parents, to be the persistent divining rods constantly pointing that out. Indeed, Judaism's incandescent beauty and deep goodness are, ultimately, the bulwarks and national creative power that hold us together and give us our strength against the darker forces that gather against the Jews from time to time.

The last phrase in The CJN's policy, "to serve the Jewish people… in all its habitations" is a direct reference to, and translation of, the biblical phrase b'chol moshvotayhem. And it is a very telling reference because it bespeaks a connection to, and an awareness of, our common Jewish heritage that has been one of the hallmarks of The CJN over the years.

That is not to say The CJN advocates or prefers one stream of Jewish involvement or one form of Jewish observance over another. We do not.

Those choices are individual choices.

What it does say about The CJN is that the countless aspects of our common Jewish heritage are a guidepost to us, helping us find the way each week as we do our best trying to serve the best interests of the Jewish people.

USYers socialize and tackle issues at convention

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Tal Ben-Zvi didn't want to miss this year's United Synagogue Youth (USY) international convention. "It's the last year I could go," said the Montreal teen. "There's an atmosphere here."

"It's the ruach," explained Toronto high schooler Michelle Seetner, using the Hebrew word for spirit. "It's also a major social event," noted Ben-Zvi of the 53rd annual gathering of the high school arm of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

With more than 1,000 North American teens at the December event, held at Toronto's Sheraton Centre Hotel, it was "a chance to meet people from all over," said Seetner.

For some, the opportunity to meet other Jewish kids is rare. In one session, a girl commented that there are only five Jews at her high school: herself, her two sisters and their two cousins.

The convention, which ran from Dec. 21 to 25, provided a Jewish context for fun, serious discussion, social action projects and the business of running the organization.

It is believed that this was the first time two Canadians were elected to the international executive. Jeremy Moses of Montreal is the new international religious education vice-president, and Leora Jackson of Toronto is international membership/Kadimah vice-president.

Facilitator Rabbi Lionel Moses of Montreal's Congregation Shaare Zion (and Jeremy's father) said it gave him a sense of confidence and well-being to see so many youngsters "studying and davening... and really committed to being Jewish."

Following opening ceremonies, complete with regional cheers, songs and regalia, participants headed for their first learning session to discuss the Jewish life cycle, the theme of this year's conference.

In small groups, facilitators – including local rabbis and educators – asked the teens about their most meaningful Jewish life cycle experience. Several participants noted it was only recently that they had come to appreciate the significance of their bar and bat mitzvahs.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation noticed two "relatively new" life cycle experiences among the teens in his group – encounters with death and mourning, which used to be largely for adults, and the second wedding of a parent.

Learning sessions covered the gamut of life cycle events from birth to death, but the hot topic in the "teen issues" session seemed to be premarital sex and birth control. Based on pre-registration choices, seven simultaneous sessions were organized on that subject. Much of the time in one of those sessions, however, focused on more general dating issues.

Other topics included kashrut, external substances (drugs and alcohol), life as an Israeli, and medical ethics.

He said participants raised some issues that he doesn't recall having to face while serving as international USY president in 1987.

"What surprised me was how open our youth are... to interdating," he told The CJN.

Choosing his words carefully and stressing that he was not judging anyone or telling them what to do, Rabbi Savenor told participants, "If your Judaism is something you're committed to in an active way, I'm not sure how interdating can play into your life."

One girl, who lives in a city with a small Jewish population and sometimes leads synagogue services, said her last boyfriend was not Jewish. "I'm not marrying now," she said, adding that her mother has made it clear she expects her to marry someone Jewish.

Another participant, the child of a mixed marriage, said she was lucky that her mother was the Jewish partner. Two participants mentioned prospective USY members who were turned down because they were not halachically Jewish, although at least one had had a Jewish upbringing.

"For [children of a Jewish father and non-Jewish mother] it will be a little harder to do things in the Jewish world," said one student.

"[But] it's not like if you intermarry, that's the end of it," said another, noting that children can be converted at a young age.

As for their own dating lives, one girl noted that she is not allowed to interdate because she is serving on USY's international board, but admitted that she might interdate once her term is over. "It's just a few months of fun before I graduate."

Rabbi Savenor told her that he hopes she doesn't fall in love during that time. "Things do happen, but at the same time we have a lot of control."

One student said he doesn't interdate because he thinks interdating can lessen the chances that Judaism will make a difference in his life.

A girl who used to interdate, but now has a Jewish boyfriend, said that having someone who understands things such as USY and ruach strengthens her, her Judaism and the relationship.

Those types of discussions are important, said A.J. Gladding of West Palm Beach, Fla., a second-time conventioneer. "You can't always find someone to listen [about the issues discussed in the sessions]. Here, you feel you can be open with people."

Over 500 international student members of United Synagogue Youth gathered at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue to create "Gifts of Hope" for distribution to the city's homeless over the holidays last month. Convened for USY's international convention, the delegates joined Ve'ahavta, the Jewish humanitarian organization, and Bear City, a new chain of create-it-yourself teddy bear stores, in the effort. Along with Bear City teddy bears, they contained toiletries, socks and assorted edibles. [Photo by Methodigm Communications.

Korczak exhibit to tour Ontario communities

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

An exhibit on the legendary Polish-Jewish doctor, author and educator Janusz Korczak, who set up homes in the Warsaw Ghetto for orphaned youths and went with them to their deaths at Treblinka, will be shown in cities around Ontario this winter.

From Jan. 19 to March 26, the exhibit "Janusz Korczak and the Children of the Warsaw Ghetto" will travel to five mid-sized communities – Kitchener, Thunder Bay, Barrie, Peterborough and St. Catharines.

Though his fame could have saved him from death, Korczak held one child by each hand and bravely led 200 of his Jewish orphans into the gas chambers and died with them on Aug. 6 1942.

"You do not leave a sick child in the night and you do not leave children at a time like this," was his answer to the Nazis when they offered to spare his life.

The exhibit, which was developed by the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre using historical photographs from the ghetto and photographs highlighting contemporary children's rights issues, recently returned from being displayed in England.

The tour is a project of the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO) of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and UIA Federations of Canada.

A special one-day preview of the exhibit, hosted by Toronto Deputy Mayor Mike Feldman under the patronage of Polish Consul General Jacek Kiesielewski and Israeli Consul General Yaakov Brosh, took place last month at Metro Hall on International Human Rights Day. It was attended by Holocaust survivors, political leaders, members of human rights agencies and other invited guests.

Ed Morgan, chair of CJC Ontario region, said that over the next few months, thousands of people will be able "to experience the life's story of this remarkable man.

"In today's fast-paced world it behooves us all to remember our heroes, especially those who act through altruism and with dignity. Dr. Korczak, despite the allure of working from outside the Warsaw Ghetto walls, chose instead to tend to the children whose Jewish parents were murdered by the Nazis."

He added that "exhibits like this one can teach us all a thing or two about helping our fellow man."

Carson Phillips, the RJCO's holocaust and adult education co-ordinator, said Korczak's legacy has grown over time to international prominence.

"He could not possibly have known that today, his writing and ideas about progressive educational practices would arouse the interest of teachers and educators today in the 21st century," Phillips said.

The exhibit will be open to the community and school groups, and teachers attending with their students will receive resource material to encourage post-exhibit activities, he said.

An integral part of the exhibit is a 25-minute video testimony from Lilian Boratz, a child survivor of the Warsaw Ghetto who now lives in Vancouver.

The exhibit will be on display at Kitchener City Hall from Jan. 19 to 27. From Feb 9 to 12, it will be at Lakehead University in Thunder Bay. From Feb 16 to 20, Am Shalom Synagogue in Barrie will host the exhibit, and from Feb. 23 to 27, it will be at Trent University in Peterborough. In its final showing before returning to Vancouver, it will be shown at Congregation B'Nai Israel in St. Catharines from March 22 to 26.

New JVS facility helps developmentally disabled

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

With interior walls boldly painted in periwinkle, maize and Kelly green, JVS Toronto's new Al Green Resource Centre was clearly designed to be upbeat and positive.

"We wanted to make this a lively and attractive place," said Chetan Bahri, manager of services for persons with developmental disabilities. With a ready smile to match the cheery walls, she oversees four programs for JVS (Jewish Vocational Service) clients with developmental or intellectual disabilities, three of which are run out of the 5,000-square-foot facility.

The oldest program, dating back to 1961, is a sheltered workshop formerly housed at the Baycrest Centre. Thirty-two participants – 12 of whom are part of a partnership program with the Reena Foundation – do packaging and assembly according to their respective skill levels.

A meticulous worker, 52-year-old Milton Brown is busy placing opaque stickers in coupon books to cover erroneous information. Within two weeks, he and the other participants will have corrected 18,000 books.

Explaining another contract on which he has worked, Brown says, "at times I put red screws into the holes of red collars, and at times I put black screws into the holes of black collars."

His work is "perfect all the time," said Bahri, one of 10 staff at the centre. She noted that the program, which serves both the Jewish and non-Jewish communities, also acts as a social network for the participants. "Their friends are here," she said.

Yitzi Iczkovitz, a 19-year-old with Down syndrome, would agree with Bahri's assessment. "It's amazing!" he said about his participation in the workshop, taking a break from sticker placement to talk to a reporter. "It's lots of fun."

Although there are many longtime participants, some may be interested in moving into employment or meaningful volunteer work in the community, noted Bahri, who began her social work career at Reena 16 years ago. "We'll work on some of their work skills, [like] being on time," she said. She also hopes to introduce literacy training and a life skills component. "Success in work is not just about work skills. It's about making your home life better so you can concentrate on work."

Until recently, however, the focus has been on moving the programs into their new home in a plaza a few blocks south of JVS' main location off Dufferin Street. An official opening was held in November.

Among the other programs at the Al Green centre is Path2Work, for people who have "fallen between the cracks [and] don't qualify for any funding that would help them get a job."

Path2Work is a pilot program funded by Human Resources Development Canada. Since it began in March out of JVS' main office, 30 people have taken part and there is currently a waiting list. (JVS also receives funding from the United Way, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the government of Ontario.)

"We're having some wonderful success stories," said Bahri, describing Path2Work's initial six weeks of learning about work skills and problem solving, followed by a temporary funded placement and ongoing support from JVS. "The idea is, if it works out, they will [end up] employed by that employer."

One participant in the program, a woman in her 30s with basic literacy skills, landed a job doing dishes and general cleaning at a banquet hall after her social worker noticed that her kitchen was consistently clean and tidy.

A program called Transition to Work focuses on special needs students leaving school in the Toronto District School Board. Ironically, it's often those with the most potential – those able to stay home unsupervised – who fall through the cracks, said Bahri.

Having the three programs in one location creates a "hub of activity for people with developmental disabilities," said Bahri. "Also, we're part of this business centre, which is nice. We're hoping to promote the workshop for some of the businesses here."

Although it was sad to leave Baycrest, said Bahri, "they really needed the space for their programming. Often good things come out of things you don't see as positive."

Remembering A Lost Hero

The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation invites the community to commemorate

Raoul Wallenberg Day*

Judy Feld Carr

Judy Feld Carr is known to the thousands of Syrian Jews she helped rescue as only "Mrs. Judy," if they know her name at all. It was only after she secretly smuggled her last Jewish family out of Syria in 2001 that her story became known. Over the span of 28 years, she arranged the clandestine rescue of 3,228 Syrian Jews at great risk to herself and her family. The recipient of many awards for her efforts, she is particularly proud of receiving the Order of Canada. Like Raoul Wallenberg, whose memory we honour tonight, Mrs. Feld Carr's actions substantiate the claim that one person can truly make a difference.

Saturday, January 17 @ 8:00 pm

Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 3080 Bayview Avenue

The legacy of Raoul Wallenberg attests to the Talmudic precept: "To save one life is as if you have saved the world." He lived his brief life with a single, selfless purpose - to help his fellow human beings. For six months between 1944 and 1945, Wallenberg, a young Swedish diplomat, without regard for personal consequences, saved tens of thousands of Hungarian Jews from certain death. In mid-January 1945, after the Red Army entered Budapest, Wallenberg vanished. His fate at the hands of the Soviets remains unknown.

What he does, not what he says

One of the frustrating aspects of Israel's unique parliamentary democracy is the absence of cabinet solidarity, discipline and confidentiality. Thus we had the bizarre but not uncommon spectacle last week of the enunciation of government policy by Agriculture Minister Yisrael Katz and its subsequent repudiation by Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Industry, Trade and Labour Ehud Olmert.

Katz, as chair of the interministerial committee on rural settlements, announced the government's intention to spend some NIS 260 million to develop and increase the population in the Golan Heights.

Syria's President Bashar Assad reacted to the announcement with predictable scorn and taunting, suggesting that such a move by Israel would make peace between the two countries impossible to attain. He was joined, in effect, if not in tone, by the U.S. State Department in criticizing Israel's decision.

But on the weekend, Olmert denied that such a plan exists. In an interview with the BBC, he said, "There is no program, there is no policy, there is no expansion of Israeli settlements in the Golan Heights… I checked it time and time again with the prime minister in the last couple of days and with the finance minister. There is no such approved program."

Setting aside the question of the appropriateness of the purported decision by the interministerial committee, it is imperative to dispel the false notions about the bona fides of the Syrian dictator. Though Israeli leaders are intrigued at Assad's sudden embrace of peace imagery, his sincerity is hotly debated in military and government circles. How, we ask, can Assad's talk of peace be anything but a hollow shell, bereft of any substance, unless and until he matches his deeds with his language?

His words may sound sweet, but his actions are poison.

Only last week, information came to light confirming that a number of terrorist acts in Israel, such as the bombing of Maxim restaurant in Haifa last October, began with instructions and/or funding from Islamic Jihad headquarters in Damascus.

Even more instructive, if alarming, about Assad's intentions is a report released last month in New York by B'nai Brith International that examined 68 Syrian school textbooks from grades 1 to 12. Titled Jihad, Jews and Anti-Semitism in Syrian School Texts, the study found that extreme anti-Semitism, calls for jihad and support for the elimination of Israel are entrenched in every level of Syria's school system. By age 15, the report concludes, Syrian children read in their Islamic studies textbooks that Jews deserve to be killed. "Coexistence with them, or having them as neighbours, is an enormous danger that threatens Islamic and Arab existence with destruction and extinction. Their criminal intention should be turned against them by way of their elimination."

Let us therefore not judge the Syrian ruler too kindly by his words. We know him all too well by his deeds.

Mullahs' perspective

What "the Jew" was to anti-Semites in times of religious and racist intolerance, Israel has now become as a nation – an entity, alone among some 200 sovereign states, uniquely damned. The Iranian mullahs who singled Israel out as the only country in the world they refused assistance from after the recent earthquake in Iran have really brought this into sharp perspective. One assumes they would sooner have accepted aid from Adolf Hitler, Mao Zedong, Pol Pot or Josef Stalin than from the Jewish state that is, for them, beyond all possibility of redemption and has no right to exist.

Sarah Nasser writes

Standing in the middle of Independence Hall in Israel last week, listening to the triumphant sounds of the Israeli national anthem, I reflected on my life as a supporter of Israel's existence. As was written in a recent CJN article ("Muslim student criticized for supporting Israel," CJN, Dec. 18, 2003), I have found it has been a tough battle to support Israel and be a faithful Muslim at the same time.

My parents were born in Tanzania and came to Canada when they were young, adapting to North American culture. I was born 20 years ago in the outskirts of Toronto to a family that was faithful to Islamic spiritual values and cultured by our Canadian surroundings. I used to attend a Toronto-based mosque that taught moral values but unfortunately never preached any support for Israel or the Jewish people. In Sunday school and Thursday night lectures, I heard a lot of anti-Israel propaganda and some anti-American slurs, with hints of anti-Semitism. Since Israel has bad public relations, even our Canadian media nudged its anti-Israel bias into the news.

Being a smart and inquisitive child, I decided to explore both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict instead of simply easily joining the anti-Israel bias that would have closed my heart and mind to the truth. Through the years, I have been objectively critiquing both sides. At this moment, I am sympathetic to the innocent Palestinian people and hope for the arrival of peace in their lives. But I also stand in solidarity with the Israeli people, and I advocate the existence of a safe and peaceful Israel. In the past few years, I have lost many Muslim friends and happily gained sincere and valuable Jewish friends. I have been assaulted and threatened for supporting Israel's existence, but on the bright side, I have gained a strong bond with open-minded individuals and organizations that are moving forward, and I plan to ride with them, fearless.

God bless Canada and Israel.

In praise of Irshad Manji

She calls herself a Muslim refusenik, the term borrowed from the Jews who refused to comply with an oppressive Soviet regime.

She is almost a lone voice of moderation from the Muslim world. Her arguments are sound, and she knows her history so she knows when the truth is being distorted. She is extremely courageous and outspoken in the face of personal threats to her life. She asks only that we engage and question those who turn to militant Islam for answers.

Being a Muslim woman and openly gay, Manji is a minority figure on many fronts. However, she is feisty, highly intelligent and articulate, and totally unafraid to confront injustice wherever she finds it.

Manji is to be celebrated, supported and honoured by all who cherish truth and freedom.

Re-assessing Chrétien I

Regarding the article "Reflections on an outgoing PM" (CJN, Dec. 11, 2003), let me see if I have it right: "[Former prime minister Jean] Chrétien may have come across as sometimes insensitive and inarticulate, but… he was a shrewd cultivator of relations." Under his leadership, Canada repeatedly sided with Israel's enemies at the United Nations, but "Chrétien attended [former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak] Rabin's funeral."

Two-and-a-half years ago in Durban, South Africa, at that infamous United Nations' sanctioned pogrom known as the UN World Conference Against Racism, Canada (unlike the United States) stayed to the end – thus adding legitimacy to that grotesque festival of hate – but, the article says, "worked hard to blunt the final statement's anti-Israel tone."

Some may even call it balance! No need to get upset.

Yes, indeed, we should not be too harsh in our evaluation of Chrétien's "legacy." According to the "proud" tradition of the Hofjuden (court Jews in 17th- and 18th-century western Europe), it could have been much worse. After all, we were only spat at.

Re-assessing Chrétien II

I cannot comprehend how the CJN's retrospective on former prime minister Jean Chrétien ("Reflections on an outgoing PM," CJN, Dec. 11, 2003) could omit all mention of how he responded the time he was faced with an official finding of illegal discrimination against Jews in Canada.

In 1999, the UN Human Rights Committee found that Canada was violating international law by not funding the religious education of Jews and other non-Catholic minorities in Ontario while funding Catholic schools. Chrétien flatly refused to take steps within the powers of the federal government to rectify this discrimination – most notably through a tax credit – in the face of the province's refusal to address the issue.

Chrétien talked a big talk on international human rights, but when it came to an authoritative finding of state-sponsored discrimination against religious minorities in Ontario, he shamefully refused to act.

And thus Canada remains a human-rights violator.

European anti-Semitism: old prejudice, new disguise

By EMANUELE OTTOLENGHI

Since the outbreak of the second intifadah, anti-Semitic incidents have dramatically increased in Europe. Many Europeans downplay this anti-Semitism by associating it exclusively with radical Muslims. Others dismiss it by saying there is too much Jewish paranoia in the wake of criticism against Israel's policies. But as recent reports on anti-Semitism in Europe show, there is more to it than just disaffected Muslim youth or Jewish imperviousness to Palestinian suffering.

Despite an uninterrupted 2,000-year presence in Europe, Jews are still targets of prejudice, their acceptance conditional upon their abandonment of their Jewish identity, especially when it is closely associated with, and expressed through, support for Israel. By overlooking the return of anti-Semitism in their midst, Europeans are ignoring the unresolved tension that has always existed between Europe and its Jews. This tension is both the cause of the resurgence of anti-Jewish sentiment and the main reason for Europe's inability to recognize its "Jewish problem."

There is little doubt that recent anti-Semitism is linked to resurgence of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. What needs to be examined is the role that Europeans, rather than Arab immigrants, play in this latest spout of anti-Jewish feeling. Europeans are quick to condemn anti-Semitism in theory, but fail to see it in its daily concrete manifestations, and sometimes even refuse to acknowledge its existence. They concede the existence of anti-Jewish hostility due to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but they refuse to view it as anti-Semitism. The dominant European view is that frequent public attacks on Israel are neither misplaced nor the cause of anti-Jewish sentiment: Israel's behaviour is reprehensible and so are those Jews who dare defend it. The argument goes that those who cry wolf are simply seeking an excuse to uncritically justify Israel by calling anti-Semitism what is actually legitimate criticism of Israel's actions. It follows that Israel deserves to be criticized and that it is the Jews, not those who express criticism, who should engage in soul-searching.

There is nothing intrinsically wrong or even remotely anti-Semitic in disagreeing with a particular Israeli policy. But the nature of the criticism, rather than its target alone, suggests that Jewish concerns are often well-founded. Criticism that focuses on what Israel is, rather than what Israel does; the description of Israel's actions through traditional anti-Semitic themes such as the blood libel, the Jewish conspiracy to rule the world, Jews and money, or traditional Christian anti-Jewish imagery; and putting the blame of Israel's predicament on its essence as a Jewish state are all recurrent European themes. Their implication is not that Israel should act differently, but that it should cease to exist as a Jewish state.

When Jews are expected to condemn Israel for the above reasons, lest European sympathy be denied, the argument that it is Israel's behaviour and uncritical support for it that invite prejudice sounds hollow. European sympathy for Jews is dependent upon the kind of political views they espouse. In a world that advocates political freedom for all, this is hardly an expression of tolerance.

This is not to suggest that Jews face a new Holocaust. In Europe, "never again" is not just a motto, but a sincere expression of remorse for Europe's past. Auschwitz has become one of the symbols of modern European identity. Europeans share a new passion for Judaism, epitomized in its large number of Jewish exhibits and museums. Many avidly read about Judaism, with hundreds of new titles released every year on every imaginable Jewish subject. Many of those who profess a liberal political affiliation, who are dedicated to human rights and tolerance, who are worried about the resurgence of the xenophobia and racism that gave birth to Nazism, unquestioningly side with the Jews in perpetuating the memory of the Nazi genocide as a warning to future generations. This fact alone is a guarantee against the recurrence of past horrors.

Nevertheless, there remains a disturbing ambiguity in the way liberal Europeans see the Jews. Many of those who sympathize with them for their suffering in the Holocaust wave Palestinian flags and equate Israel to Nazism, claiming that "yesterday's victims are today's perpetrators." In doing so, they demonize Israel and Jews who support it. The same left-wing anti-racist activists, who oppose xenophobia and neo-Nazism, consider Israel a colonial state – a tool of American imperialism that deserves to be destroyed – and speak of Zionist conspiracies to rule the world and oppress Arabs. Israel's Jewish supporters are viewed as fascists and apologists for murderers. They deserve no dignity, no respect, no sympathy and no protection.

European liberals love Jews, but not when they assert their rights as a national group. Jews as a nation deserve no sympathy and no rights, although Jews as individuals are worthy of both. Their hero is the Jew who denounces Israel and disassociates himself from it, rejecting any link with Jewish national identity other than as a condemnation of Zionism. For them, and for the Jew they celebrate as their hero, Zionism is a perversion of Jewish humanism, something that today's Europe deeply cherishes, because Zionism has reversed Jewish historical passivity to Jewish self-defence and survival. In its resort to force, Zionism implies the difficulty of dealing with sometimes impossible moral dilemmas, which traditional Jewish passivity in the wake of persecution never implied. For Europe, the Jew must be a victim because victims can do no wrong. Any victim becomes the latest Jew to defend, and by implication, those who persecute those victims inevitably become today's Nazis. It is therefore expected that the Jews should denounce Israel, which is viewed as the latest incarnation of an evil they suffered from not so long ago.

Jews who do criticize Israel and disassociate themselves from it enjoy European respect. Denouncing Israel becomes their passport to full European membership. The European Jewish hero is not David Ben Gurion, not Moshe Dayan, not even Mordechai Anielewicz. It is Noam Chomsky and his imitators, whose Jewish pride is expressed through their shame for Israel's existence.

Europe loves and worships the Jew as a victim, but hates and despises the Jew who dares embrace a weapon to fight back. This duality is not only a symptom of the unresolved relationship that Europe has with its Jews, but also the most recent manifestation of European anti-Semitism. It embodies Europe's inability to associate Jews with the legitimate use of political power, including sovereign power. The Jew should be defenceless, a sacrificial lamb, the conscience of the world, capable of absorbing the pain visited upon him by injustice and of sublimating it through an inner strength that becomes the guiding line of moral rectitude for surrounding societies. As the embodiment of a new universal morality, the Jew must also be assimilated. Jews cannot be a religious and ethnic minority in the midst of multicultural Europe, but the model of European integration. Hence, the Jew must be camouflaged:

aware of his membership in the Jewish people, but indistinguishable from the surrounding environment, entitled to be proud of his historical background and cultural patrimony, but not devoted to its continuity. That background belongs to Jewish museums, not to living communities and thriving congregations. The Jew that Europeans love knows he is Jewish, but does not know how to be Jewish anymore. Others will remind him of his identity, but if it were up to him, Judaism – as a tradition, a faith and a practice of commandments as well as membership in a collective and commitment to its survival – would not exist. The Europeans love the Jew who has turned Judaism into a universal, humanistic mission, devoid of its distinctive religious and national features. Accomplishing this mission requires the extinction of the concrete Jew and its replacement with an abstract Jew – namely, the unconditional rejection of violence and a universal message of brotherly love.

That explains Europe's enthusiasm for such films as The Pianist by Roman Polanski or Life is Beautiful by Roberto Benigni. The hero of Life is Beautiful is Jewish, but cannot be outwardly recognized as a Jew: he has shed every Jewish ritual, has married out, does not speak the language anymore and does not "look Jewish." He is Jewish because he is a victim.

The hero of Polanski's movie, meanwhile, is imbued with European culture. He is incapable of defending himself and survives the Holocaust not in order to ensure Jewish survival but to bear witness to a universal message of suffering that transcends its Jewish specificity. Polanski's Jew is saved, but what survives through him is classical (European) music, not the Jewish people.

That is what Europe wants of its Jews: to assimilate and disappear as a people, but remain as a moral legacy.

Europe's Jew is the idealization of innocence. He represents, with his unconditional rejection of violence even when confronting extermination, a primeval condition of innocence that precedes original sin. In politics, that sin is the use of power and the sometimes impossible moral choices and dilemmas that power demands. That is why post-modern, multicultural and multilateral Europe – a culture that rejects the use of force as a tool of international diplomacy and nationalism as a vehicle of identity – strongly identifies with the image of the persecuted Jew.

Europe would like to see the same kind of Jew reflected in Israel's behaviour. Israel should not be closely associated with Jewish nationalism and should not be committed to Jewish continuity. It should remain a victim. For European liberals, Israel should sever its ties with Jewish tradition and consign its people to history in order to adopt the universal principles supposedly embraced by today's Europe. Israel's stubborn refusal to do so and its attachment to nationalism, which Europeans see as the source of all 20th-century evils, draw condemnation. For Europe, Israel becomes Nazism, and the victimized Jew becomes the alter ego of the aggressive Jew the Europeans pretend to see in a Jewish state that dares use force to ensure its survival. Europeans love the idealized Jew whom their ancestors loathed and killed in the flesh and despise the real Jew who, having survived genocide, finally learned to defend himself.

Precisely because Israel was born of war and is defended by the sword in the name of a national Jewish identity, Israel is accused of having been born in sin. Israel represents for Europeans the loss of Jewish innocence. Insofar as Jews identify with Israel, they deprive Europe of the victimized Jew that so well represents Europe's self-image.

This is why Europe's liberals refuse to defend Jews from anti-Semitism stemming from the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The only Jew worthy of European respect ceased to be Jewish long ago, except perhaps in name. The Jew who stubbornly clings to a Jewish identity and identifies with a nation, a culture, a tradition, a distinct identity and is committed to Jewish continuity is viewed with hostility. The only Jew that Europe truly loves is the Jew who has consciously given up being Jewish. Only by volunteering to become extinct can Jews hope to survive in today's tolerant Europe.

Chesed and community

It has become fashionable to be disheartened by the present state of our Jewish community. Criticism abounds about deficiencies in community spirit and communal action, and many young Jews do not even want to work for community organizations.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Given that state of affairs, I want to tell you a good-news story. Don't get me wrong. There is plenty to find fault with and a great deal of improvement is needed. But there is also much that can convey respect and pride.

Recently, my family has been the recipient of an outpouring of a unique kind of Jewish kindness – chesed. Chesed is not easily translated. Many define the word as "acts of kindness," or of "loving kindness, mercy and benevolence."

But it means much more. One of God's attributes is chesed. Biblical Ruth was repeatedly complimented for her acts of chesed to both the dead and the living.

The term refers to deeds that are clearly above and beyond normal human decency or beneficence. Justice is necessary, but we humans could not survive without the linked notions of chesed and rachamim, mercy and compassion. That is one of Judaism's primary convictions. Traditionally, we describe care of the dead as an act of chesed shel emet, kindness of the truest sort. Anticipating no payback, we care for the deceased with the purest and most selfless of motivations.

So we have a history and a tradition of accepting, and even expecting, that periodically members of our community will step forward and display an inordinate sense of compassion and human kindness – kind-hearted souls who redeem us all.

From New York to Boston to Montreal, I have seen individual Jews and communal organizations reach out to us without even knowing us. They heard that we were in a crisis and they wanted to help. Actually, in the religious community, people just said they wanted to do chesed. At one point we tried to stop the flow, but were told we could not: too many people had already lined up. This was their chesed and how could we be so selfish as to prevent that. Amazing!

I am not talking about a mass effort of considerable or comprehensive action, but rather about small deeds, little acts that slowly accumulate and make life easier or more comfortable. People willing to drive, to do carpool, to play with the kids, to say hello, to shop, to pray and to let us know that they care.

Most notably, since my daughter-in-law took ill, dinner has arrived every night. Quietly and consistently, this small gesture by numerous women has filled my world with chesed. It is such a small thing, yet it is so substantive and far-reaching. I am in awe and grateful.

Terror in the name of God

There are books that make you laugh, and a few that make you weep. Terror in the Name of God: Why Religious Militants Kill makes you weep. Author Jessica Stern has written a detailed analysis of why and how religious zealots from three western religions – Islam, Judaism and Christianity – recruit and maintain terrorist organizations. I weep because Jewish terror has a place in this saga.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

What is terrorism? Stern defines it as "an act or threat of violence against non-combatants with the object of exacting revenge, intimidation, or otherwise influencing an audience." More particularly, the book deals with "terrorists who claim to be seeking religious goals." We in North America have become all too familiar with the terror of Islamists and groups such as the Army of God, who have wounded and killed doctors who perform abortions. Canadian Jewish doctors have been targets of murderous so-called "pro-lifers," deluded people who regard it as a holy mission to kill.

Religious terrorists demonize their enemies. "We" become the chosen and "they" become the sub-human enemy. Religious terror sees no moral ambiguities – there is only good or evil. All is black or white. There are no shades of grey, no chance to see into the other person's world. When God is on your side, nothing is extreme. All is permitted, and nothing is beyond the pale of human decency.

But my distress came not from reading about the militants on the far right or even about how Islamist terror has spread throughout the Muslim world, but from the chapter titled "History."

Political philosopher Isaiah Berlin once wrote that Israel has always had "more history than geography." We consider our religion to have a deep historical basis, and the return to the Land of Israel to be the way we have reclaimed our place in history. Yet history can be a trap as well as a door to understanding our past and our present, a deception as well as a path to our future.

In 1990, the Temple Mount Faithful announced its intention to lay the cornerstone for the Third Temple. Riots ensued in Jerusalem. Other modern-day zealots wounded Palestinian mayors in a series of bombings. A plan to attack the mosques on the mount itself was uncovered. Hebron was the scene of a massacre. Just last year when we were in Jerusalem a group of zealots planned to dynamite an Arab girls' school, a plot which, had it succeeded, would have killed and wounded many innocent children. How have we come to this?

The centre of radical Jewish groups has been a religious one. The movement is intertwined with the settlement movement. Not all settlers are terrorists, obviously, but certain settlements are the homes of the most radical leaders of a loose group of like-minded messianic Jews. Embedded in the settlement ideology is the belief that Jews have a historic, indeed divinely appointed, right to all the land on which Palestinian Arabs live. These Jews believe that their efforts are the prelude to the restoration of the Temple, sacrificial service and a new kingdom on all the biblical land of Israel. Rebuilding the Temple will facilitate the redemption.

Ironically, such thinking has led these millenarian Jews to seek allies among Christian groups also looking forward to the end of days when the messiah will reign. Of course, the groups differ radically on whose messiah that will be. But for now, they have made common cause.

As they read history, we are in the end of days, and any act is justified. Another irony: like Christian and Muslim radicals, Jewish extremists decry the sins of modernity: individualism, feminism, sexual license, pop culture and globalization.

They believe that every inch of the land, from the Mediterranean east to Jordan is holy land and only Jews have a right to it. To allow it to remain in others' hands is sacrilege. Jews – the "We," the "Good" – must do anything and everything to regain and hold it against "Them" the "Evil." The God of history has given it to "Us." The Temple must be rebuilt, as it is the "telephone link" to God.

It is to weep. Instead of the holy mission that Judaism offers to better the world through deeds of loving kindness, they have chosen to worship the Golden Calf of land, a land now saturated with blood.

Bedtime with the chassidic spa treatment

During the Chanukah that just ended, my wife and I discovered the true miracle of the holiday. On the first night, we gave our two kids enough sufganiyot, chocolate coins and other treats so they would sleep poorly for one night. But, miraculously, they slept terribly for eight nights.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

As a parent of two young children, I'm always sensitive about sleep issues, but they are especially pronounced at this time of year. We loosen the rules about how many treats they can have and we go to Chanukah parties that end later than the kids' regular bedtime. To add to the mayhem, a late December day in Winnipeg offers about nine minutes of daylight. You never really know what time it is. All you know is that it's dark.

We've tried all sorts of bedtime techniques, with varying degrees of success and failure. When Cari (now 4½) and Noah (now 2½) were infants, we were sporadic disciples of Dr. Richard Ferber, the renowned U.S. infant sleep guru whose method involves letting kids cry in bed for timed intervals. Our kids did their part. They howled so loudly in the summer that we had to close the windows lest they set off neighbourhood car alarms and aggravate the dogs on the block. (Never mind what the neighbours might think!)

As they are getting older, they still aren't great sleepers. Daughter Cari will, on occasion and without warning, refuse to sleep in her bed. She ends up in our bed, on the living room couch or – for something a little different – on the floor next to our bed. Sometimes, her journey around the house is accompanied by a sound-barrier-challenging, over-tired tantrum.

Noah, who just started sleeping in a "big-boy" bed, often refuses to lie down, will insist on reading more books than are contained in the Library of Congress, and will demand a post-lights-out cup of milk to wash down his pre-lights-out cup of milk.

Still, bedtime can be the nicest part – albeit a two-hour part – of the day. At it's best, it's peaceful, relaxing and an offers an excellent opportunity to teach. In our home, it's also probably the most Jewish part of the day.

My wife and I take turns lying down with each child. We usually talk about both the day that just ended and the day to come.

With Cari, we share some Hebrew words and talk about the holidays. We used to tell the made-up story about how the Teletubbies – those rotund, inane, babbling, cherubic, velour creatures – celebrate Shabbat. (Tinky Winky brought the chicken. Dipsy brought the juice for kiddush. Po set the table. And Laa-Laa brought the challah.) And for at least 2½ years, her day has ended with either my wife or me rubbing her back and singing the Shema – kind of a chassidic spa treatment.

Noah could bring Napster to its knees with the number of songs in his brain. He practically needs a whole Hebrew concert performed before he'll even acknowledge that night has come. He also likes the Shema/back-rub combo.

As colourful, fun and teachable as the bedtime routines are, they're exhausting. They leave little time for much else. I'm told by parents of slightly older children that one day soon I'll forget much of the toddler bedtime experience. The passage of time and the loss of brain cells from lack of sleep will help me forget about the actual sleep deprivation. I don't doubt it will happen, and that's sad. The kids will likely forget much of the bedtime circus as they get older, too.

But, as they grow into adulthood, if they feel warm, loved and connected every time they say the Shema or hum a Hebrew song, it will have all been worth it.

The Kirshner File

Sinophile Sidney Shapiro looks back

Debilitated by a terrible case of sea sickness, war veteran, lawyer and Sinophile Sidney Shapiro felt really miserable. On his maiden voyage from New York City to China, he vomited constantly. When he finally arrived in Shanghai – China's fabled international port – on April 1, 1947, April Fool's Day, he was glad to set foot on land at last.

Sheldon Kirshner in Beijing

Stepping off a gangplank from the freighter that had borne him queasily to the Paris of the East, Shapiro tried out his Mandarin on the first Chinese person he met. "I couldn't understand a word of the Shanghai dialect," he said, grimacing at the memory.

Shapiro, who had learned the rudiments of Mandarin in a U.S. army crash course during World War II, went to China with the intention of refining his Chinese language skills. "I thought I would stay a year."

Thoroughly integrated into Chinese society, his nasal Brooklyn accent and his taste for bagels, cheese and lox notwithstanding, Shapiro is perfectly comfortable in his skin as a secular American Jew who adopted China as his homeland. He wed a Chinese actress, raised a family, earned a living as a translator, author and occasional movie actor, became one of the very few Westerners to actually take out Chinese citizenship, and acquired a Chinese name, Sha Boli.

"I had no reason to leave," explained Shapiro, a feisty man in apparent good health who peppers his sentences with Yiddishisms. "I was married to a woman I dearly loved. The Chinese were warm and friendly. China was fascinating. It was wonderful. Conditions were appalling, life was hard, but I got the best of the worst."

He lives in a modest, four-room cinderblock house with a small courtyard enclosed by a wall. The drab interior is cluttered with utilitarian furniture and illuminated by the glow of a single light bulb. On the walls are framed photographs of Mao Zedong and Chou Enlai, two of China's iconic leaders, and of Shapiro's late wife, Fengzi (Phoenix).

Lucid and spry, Shapiro – the subject of a 1985 profile in the Israeli daily Ma'ariv – is a whirlwind of activity. He is translating a biography of Deng Xiaoping, the visionary Chinese leader who brought the principles of the market economy to Communist China. He is a member of the People's Political Consultative Council, a toothless non-governmental organization that serves as a kind of watchdog to the rubberstamp Chinese Congress. He writes letters. (One of his pen pals, Isi Liebler, is vice-president of the World Jewish Congress). He surfs the Web.

The scion of Jewish immigrants from Latvia and Ukraine who settled in the United States in the 1890s, Shapiro was born in 1915 and studied law in New York City. Although he considers himself an agnostic, he professes to be "very emotionally attached" to his Jewish roots and Israel.

Yet Shapiro's only child, Yamei, a 53-year-old physician who lives next door, was not raised Jewishly. Neither was his granddaughter, Stella, who studied in the United States, speaks fluent and idiomatic English and works for the American Chamber of Commerce in Beijing. Shapiro, the author of Jews in Old China (Hippocrene), an account of the now-vanished Jewish community of Kaifeng, recognizes the ironic parallels. Like the lost Jews of Kaifeng, his own family has been completely absorbed by the host culture.

Shapiro's connection with China goes back to 1942, when the U.S. Army, anticipating a landing in China to repel Japan, began recruiting soldiers as future interpreters. Shapiro studied Chinese language, politics and history at Cornell University, glad to be plucked from an anti-aircraft unit in New Jersey.

Demobilized in 1945 without ever having put his Mandarin to practical use, Shapiro enrolled at Columbia University, and later at Yale, to continue his Chinese studies.

Finishing these courses, he booked passage on a freighter bound for Shanghai, a frenetic city torn by fighting pitting the Communists against the ruling Nationalists. Casting around for a job while he boned up on his Mandarin, Shapiro found a position in an American law firm. Then he met Fengzi, "the Helen Hayes of China's theatre." She died seven years ago, and he still mourns her passing.

Shapiro was neither a Communist nor a party member. "I don't respond well to discipline," he said mischievously. Yet his sympathies were clearly with the Communists, as were Fengzi's. "I was radicalized by the horrors of Shanghai – the huge gap between rich and poor, the extreme corruption, the rampant greed."

Fleeing Shanghai, the young couple travelled to Beijing. There they welcomed the arrival of the People's Liberation Army, the vanguard of the People's Republic of China. Shapiro describes these events in his 1997 autobiography, I Chose China (Hippocrene), which is available on Amazon.com.

Sidney Shapiro

Those were difficult days, he recalled. "There wasn't much to eat. Turnips and cabbage in winter. Very little meat."

In the wake of the civil war, Shapiro joined the Foreign Language Press as a literary and legal translator. Though he was paid a decent salary, he was never able to afford a car – a great luxury prior to the late 1980s – and pedalled around town by bike.

He supplemented his income by appearing as an American in such propagandistic Chinese films as Eagles of the Sky and The Xian Incident and by writing his memoir and a book about the Jews of China.

International politics rarely affected him, even when China and the United States clashed in the Korean war. "The Chinese said, 'We're not fighting the American people.' They made a clear distinction between the U.S. government and the people."

Shapiro, though, flew into a rage after learning that his wife had been strafed by U.S. military aircraft while entertaining Chinese troops on the front.

He acquired Chinese citizenship in 1963, but by doing so, he automatically lost his American citizenship. He has no regrets. "I was happily married. I had a useful, enjoyable job. We had a home. I was involved in everything in China. And I was never made to feel like an outsider."

Nor, he added, was anti-Semitism ever a problem. "The Chinese have never heard of it," he quipped. "You feel at home here. You have to be reminded you're different."

Only once, during the tumultuous Cultural Revolution in the late 1960s and early 1970s, was Shapiro tempted to leave China. This happened after his wife was arrested and charged with being a counter-revolutionary. During the next four years, he saw her only twice. "The revolution," he said, "was taken over by holier-than-Mao elements who wanted to feather their own nests."

As a so-called foreign expert, Shapiro was entitled to visit his parents and sister in the United States every other year at the expense of the Chinese government. But when Shapiro applied for a visa after presenting his Chinese passport to the American consulate in Toronto in 1971, the consular officials there were flummoxed. A week elapsed before he was granted a visa.

Shapiro returned to Canada in 1987 at the invitation of literary agent Michael Levine and TV mogul Moses Znaimer. "I met them at a banquet in Beijing, and they were enthralled with this Litvak."

While in Toronto, Shapiro gave a talk about China and himself at the Royal Ontario Museum. He repeated the exercise at the Saidye Bronfman Centre in Montreal.

Shapiro, who first visited Israel in 1989, supports its right to nationhood, but is hardly enamored of the current Israeli government. "I'm very much disgusted with Sharon," he said in a reference to Israel's prime minister. Reaching into an album, he retrieved a photograph of himself with Shimon Peres, the interim leader of Israel's Labor party. "I'm very impressed with him," he declared.

Shapiro, who has close ties with the Israeli embassy in Beijing, strongly believes that China would not have been hostile to Israel from the 1960s to the early1980s had it not backed the United States in the Korean war.

Though he is generally loath to criticize China, Shapiro is critical of some of its economic policies and of its inability to jettison its "feudal baggage." He hopes that China will get a taste of "real democracy," but is not hopeful. "It's pie in the sky."

Nevertheless, Shapiro has no plans to leave China and live in the United States again. Asked which country he prefers, he replied, "I love America, but I love China more."

Jewish Life

How to insult relatives and influence people

By RABBI YECHIEL GOLDREICH

Rabbinic Reflections

What could the old man have been thinking? He ruined the sweet Norman Rockwell moment. On his deathbed, he insisted that the old country was better and that he wanted to be buried there. He criticized his eldest son, cursed the sins of the next two sons, he questioned the Jewishness of his two grandchildren, and then told the younger grandson that he had greater potential than the older. Why would our ancestor Jacob behave in such a way?

Jacob, of all people, should have known better. He knew of the bitterness engendered when authority figures withhold their approval, when people speak and behave in too strong-minded a manner. The tragic results provide the primary theme for the whole book of Genesis, as evidenced by Cain and Abel, Isaac and Ishmael, and Jacob himself and his brother Esau. He must have remembered the most trying episode of his life, the rivalry between his son Joseph and his other sons and the pain that it caused.

Couldn't he have just let things slide? Couldn't the Torah tell us that Jacob simply went with the flow, that he kissed his family and said only nice stuff to everyone? That, unlike all the hard feelings and feuding that had gone on from the beginning of Genesis, Jacob gathered his children round and stated unequivocally that he was proud of each and that his soul would dance at every family simchah?

The simple answer is that our saintly forefather Jacob used blunt words because he loved them and knew the effect those well-chosen words would have at that emotion-laden moment. He must have waited years to choose the right moment, the most effective moment, to tell them what they needed to hear. The future of the Jews would be in Israel, not Egypt. That needed to be said. Reuben was not fit for leadership, Judah was. Ephraim and Menashe were too Egyptian. Ephraim one day would be greater than Menashe, and Simon and Levi were too reckless. It may have been hard to hear, but it needed to be said. What's more, it worked.

The Jews did make it out of Egypt. Reuben never did become leader. Ephraim and Menashe lived up to the predictions and blessings. Simon's descendants would become the schoolteachers of Israel (the bittersweet wish for "active" youngsters that they should receive the "naches" they gave others). Perhaps more than anyone, Levi cleaned up his act, producing Moses, Aaron and a tribe devoted to the service of God.

Thank God for the foresight of our forefather Jacob, who didn't go wobbly when a firm hand was needed.

Too often we hear the regular rants from the regular people and observe the equally destructive silence of those who are too hesitant to speak. May the Almighty grant us the wisdom to know when and how strong well-placed opinion is to be used. May our leaders fight for truth in a way that is wise during these times of fateful decision for Israel.

Accessible guide for learning

The Jewish Study Bible*, edited by Adele Berlin and Marc Zev Brettler, Oxford University Press, $72.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This impressive and innovative work is a major accomplishment. It includes the Jewish Publications Society's Tanach translation, a running commentary and annotations on all biblical books – drawing liberally on both ancient and recent sources – and introductions and essays by a stellar group of Judaic experts.

The accessible essays deal with many aspects of the Bible, including midrashic, mystical and liturgical traditions.

Handsomely produced, the volume's 2,200 pages include helpful chronologies, tables and charts, full colour and line drawings, maps, a full glossary of technical terms, a chart of weights and measures and a timeline listing rulers in the land of Israel and the surrounding empires during the biblical period.

In his essay "Modern Jewish Interpretation," David Sperling evaluates a number of recent Bible commentaries. He points out that the Conservative movement's Etz Hayim commentary provoked unexpected controversy.

Many congregants, accustomed to the older and more traditional Hertz version, were shocked to learn, among other things, that the Exodus from Egypt and the conquest of Canaan might have "little or no historical basis." Outside the movement, some haredi rabbis equated Etz Hayim's questions about the Bible's factuality with the blood libel. Sperling writes, "A calmer perspective reveals Etz Hayim to be a useful digest of the JPS Torah Commentary in one volume, with the addition of homiletical comments, and notes and essays of special interest to Conservative Jews."

Meanwhile, Sperling faults the Artscroll Series of biblical books, produced largely for the Orthodox community, for excluding data drawn from the field of archeology as well as gentile scholarship, non-Orthodox scholarship and suspect-Orthodox scholarship.

"As a result, the richness of traditional and Orthodox commentary is reduced in this series to harmonization, continuous apologetic and pietistic moralizing."

In her essay "The Bible in Jewish Philosophical Tradition," Hava Tirosh-Samuelson singles out Judith Plaskow as an outstanding Jewish theologian, who has influenced the way an increasing number of Jews approach the Bible. A well-known feminist, she argues that women were present at Sinai, "but it was the male-centred rabbinic tradition that ignored, silenced and marginalized them. A new reading of the Bible is necessary if Jewish women are to be restored to their rightful place within the tradition and become creative readers of their own sacred texts."

When was the Hebrew Bible completed in its present form? Brettler says that its final stage, or canonization, was a reaction to the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE and its aftermath. The development of canonizing the Hebrew Bible had begun more than half a millennium earlier, with the destruction of the First Temple (586 BCE), and intensified with this latest crisis. Through the canonization of the Hebrew Bible, which later gave rise to the Mishnah and Talmud, Jews became known as the people of the Book.

Brettler says that those who decided on the Bible's final version were remarkably inclusive. Instead of creating a small, highly consistent text, they made efforts to include many of the viewpoints in ancient Israel, incorporating differing and even contradictory traditions into this single, and singular, book.

Jewish biblical study, including concern for Jewish traditional interpretation, has now entered mainstream academic scholarship and includes a growing number of scholars at Israeli universities. It is an ongoing process that inevitably adds to our knowledge and deepens our understanding.

The Oxford Jewish Study Bible will provide a valuable and noteworthy addition to any congregational or home library.

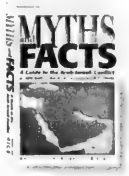
Stopping arms smuggling

MYTH:

Israel demolishes homes in the Rafah refugee camp as part of its campaign to oppress the Palestinians.

FACT:

Israel has engaged in military operations in the Rafah refugee camp, including the demolition of homes, in an effort to curtail Palestinian smuggling operations. Rafah is a city in the Gaza Strip that is divided by the border with Egypt. Palestinians began building tunnels in the area in 1982 to smuggle various items under the Israel-Egypt border fence. Since 1994, when Israel turned the area over to its control, the Palestinian Authority has been responsible for security in the area. While the PA initially worked to stop the construction of tunnels, it now actively supports the smugglers.



To avoid detection of the tunnels, the Palestinians build them in civilian homes. In 2002, the Israeli army discovered 33 tunnels. It found another 36 by mid-October 2003.

The smugglers bring goods such as cigarettes, automobile parts, clothing, drugs, electronics and foreign currency purchased or stolen in Egypt for resale in the Gaza Strip. But of most concern to Israel is the smuggling of terrorists and weapons such as rocket-propelled grenades and launchers, rifles, explosives and ammunition, which often make their way to the West Bank.

Large-scale Israeli operations against the construction of the tunnels coincided with intelligence reports that the Palestinians were attempting to smuggle more sophisticated weapons such as Katyusha rockets, which could hit Israeli cities, and Stinger missiles, which could shoot down Israeli civilian and military aircraft. These weapons are being brought in to support the terrorist operations of groups such as Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (with the help of Iran), as well as to arm PA security services.

Smuggling operations have intensified in the last three years as Israel has blocked other smuggling routes, and as the Palestinians have escalated their violent campaign against Israel. Israel demolishes Palestinian homes because they are used to conceal the tunnels connecting Gaza and Egypt. Many Palestinians in Rafah are impoverished and see involvement in the smuggling operations as an opportunity to improve their economic situation. They are paid well to excavate, transfer goods and allow their homes to be used to hide the tunnels.

The PA has given Palestinians an even greater incentive to participate in smuggling by offering them alternative housing in the nearby town of Tel-Sultan if Israel demolishes their homes. Some Palestinians have even lied about constructing tunnels in the hope that the Israeli army will destroy their houses and they can get nicer ones from the PA.

Today we continue our visit of some of your favourite websites, including both the ones you created and the ones you find yourself visiting over and over again.

Ottawa artist Marc Eliany wrote to tell me about several sites that he is involved in. Eliany is an Ottawa-based artist who was born in Morocco and moved to Israel before settling in Canada. In addition to posting generous samples of his artwork on his site, he also presents a photographic essay of his travels to his ancestral home of Morocco and the last Jews of Ifrikia [www.artengine.ca/eliany/]. Eliany, who is interested in Sephardi culture and contributions to Jewish life, has also created another site that offers brief biographies of prominent Sephardi Jews. The biographies are in French, but another part of the site explains in English the derivations of common Sephardi names [www.virtualpublications.ca/]. You can read more about Eliany at the Canadian Museum of Civilization website [http://makeashorterlink.com/?C13C518E6].

Montreal's Jean-Philippe Fontanille is a man with a mission. Fontanille is a numismatist who has undertaken a vast project – the indexing, classification and representation of biblical coins. His site contains photos of hundreds of beautifully scanned coins starting from the fourth century BCE. And if you think that you may have a treasure sitting in your drawer, you'll appreciate valuations given for the coins. For example, a coin from the Bar Kochba era in extra fine condition sold for $5,000 (US) in May 2002. Fontanille launched the Menorah Coin Project website just over a year ago, but expects that the project will take several years to complete [www.menorahcoinproject.org/].

Last June, after writing an article about ketubot, I received an e-mail from Jerusalem-based calligrapher Norman Slepkov. Originally from St. Catharines, Ont., Slepkov immigrated to Israel in 1970 and first started creating ketubot when he got married. You can view his samples online [www.normansketubot.com/] along with the non-commissioned "Royal Ketuba" that he created to mark the 1981 wedding of the Prince Charles and Lady Diana. The site also has a photo of the thank-you note Slepkov received from Buckingham Palace [http://www.normansketubot.com/Royal.html].

One-time Torontonian Stephen Glazer made aliyah 24 years ago. He brought to my attention a site run by Itim, The Jewish Life Information Center. This trilingual site (English, Hebrew and Russian) does a very good job explaining the significance of life cycle events such as brit milahs, bar and bat mitzvahs, marriages and burials. But it goes a step further and takes a look at the legal ramifications of these milestones for Israeli residents. This site is a must visit for anyone planning to move to Israel [www.itim.org.il/].

Kerstin Camenietzki wrote to tell me about the new website for the John and Molly Pollock Holocaust Collection at Centennial College in Toronto. Although only a small portion of the collection is reproduced online, you can view samples from the 1941 artwork of Arthur Szyk that mocks the architects of European fascism. And you can listen to Stephen Lewis interviewing Elie Wiesel about his fears that the Holocaust will be forgotten [www.centennialcollege.ca/holocaust_pollock/].

CJN food columnist Norene Gilletz wrote to tell me about a wonderful Jewish food website that I had never visited before. Jewish-Food is actually a moderated list and discussion area for kosher cooking [http://groups.yahoo.com/group/jewish-food/]. Last year alone, there were more than 10,000 messages about everything from the perfect pastrami recipe and how to use crock pot liners for cholent to a request from someone named Bobbi who was looking for a sweet potato and marshmallow recipe (which she received!). You must join this free list if you wish to send a message or visit the message archive, but it's well worth the effort. If you love kosher food and love talking about it, this is the place for you. Thanks, Norene.

Do you have a favourite Jewish or Israeli website? Or have you created one yourself? Tell me about it at the address below and I may mention it in a future column.

Torah in motion tackles the December dilemma

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to the CJN

Dec. 25 can be a dull day for Jews. It's a time of year when Christianity overshadows the calendar, and many of us take various measures – going out to the movies, hiding at home, immersing in Torah study or conversely, avoiding Torah study – to forget Christmas is even happening.

This year, right after Shacharit services on the 25th, Beth Jacob v'Anshei Drildz Congregation opened its doors to another all-day Torah in Motion conference co-sponsored by Jews for Judaism. The topic was "Jews, Christians and the Struggle for Truth."

The slogan of Torah in Motion – "Confronting the Challenges of Modernity" – is one Beth Jacob's Rabbi Jay Kelman takes seriously.

"We can't ghettoize ourselves," he said in an interview. "We must open our ways of thinking."

> 'We must open our ways of thinking'

Jewish-Christian relations have never been easy, he said, but we must try to learn from one another nevertheless, especially at this time of year.

"Obviously, it's Dec. 25th; it's Christmas, it's Chanukah," Rabbi Kelman said.

The goal of Torah in Motion is to engage in "issues which are relevant to the modern world… even if they are different or controversial."

The conference talks made comparisons between Christianity and Islam, evaluated talmudic references to Jesus, explored concepts of idolatry within Christianity and examined the importance of revelation in both religions.

Torah in Motion has previously addressed such topics as debunking Torah codes and drug and alcohol use among religious teens. Its speakers avoid simplistic answers, taking what Rabbi Kelman calls a "critical view… rooted within a traditional framework."

The last topic of the day was "Mistakes and Misconceptions: What Jews Do Not But Should Know About Christians and Christianity," presented by Herb Basser, an Orthodox rabbi and professor of religious studies at Queen's University. Basser pointed out that several Christian doctrines may be less exclusively so than we assume. The Jewish position on issues such as faith healing, Pharisees, the Trinity or the role of the messiah is never one we should take for granted.

Many Jews believe that vicarious atonement, where one person's death heals the sins of another, is a uniquely Christian idea. However, Basser said, there are many Jewish traditions from which this idea is drawn. For instance, the death of Miriam is connected by the commentator Rashi with the laws of the red heifer: "Just as sacrifices [like the red heifer] atone, so does the death of the righteous atone."

When we open our eyes to Christian scholarship, we find surprises, said Basser. Sir Isaac Newton, for instance, was in his day the third greatest Talmudist in England.

"He was castigated by his bishop for reading Talmud [in the original], and never going to church… he knew more than most 17th-century rabbis."

We may view Christianity as a "daughter religion," but that doesn't do justice either to its similarities or to our own religious needs, Basser said. Christianity began evolving at the same point as modern rabbinic Judaism as separate "strands" of the same religion. Basser called it a "sister religion… a kind of Judaism that Jews rejected en masse at a certain point."

Though we don't accept Christianity's central tenets, Basser feels that its emphasis on moral law and on personal connection with God are "worth thinking about."

Rabbi Kelman agrees.

"Even in its worst forms – not to mention the Christianity of today – it is not all bad."

Christian decorum, for instance, has enriched our spirituality through quiet services and inspirational sermons.

Reena offers Holocaust course

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For the first time, Reena is offering a course on the Holocaust for people with learning and/or developmental disabilities.

The intention of the 10-week course is to correct the mistaken perception that people with developmental disabilities or special needs need not be informed of any traumatic episodes, says Arlene Margolese, manager of volunteer services and Judaic programming at Reena.

"They are often overlooked when teaching about life-cycle events, customs of mourning, or the Holocaust, because their family is hesitant about troubling them," Margolese says.

"The truth is, they deserve to be told. [When someone dies], they may wonder why that person is not visiting. They may not be able to articulate it, but it could come out in bad behaviour."

With regard to the Holocaust, she says, "we believe that with specialized teaching, people with developmental disabilities [can be] provided with a greater understanding of what happened to their ancestors.

"This knowledge will help them develop greater self esteem by strengthening their sense of belonging to their Jewish heritage."

The ability to read or write is not a prerequisite to participate in the course, which was made possible by a grant from the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

Margolese says it is clear from the many questions from people with developmental disabilities that their queries have remained unanswered, leaving them with little understanding of the Holocaust, and perhaps, misconceptions.

"They generally have not been included in school programs covering this subject and there are few books or reports at their level of understanding available," she says.

Minnie Ross, Reena's manager of communications, says that rather than concentrating on the horrors of the Holocaust, they plan on highlighting the bravery, ingenuity and determination of the Jews to survive and flourish.

People with developmental disabilities do better with "concretes as opposed to abstracts" she says, so they plan to use such teaching methods as videos, slide presentations, visits to Holocaust museums, and talks from Holocaust survivors, siblings or children of survivors and Righteous Gentiles or their surviving family members.

The course will include a brief history of the war, Nazism and anti-Semitism and an overview of who were the targeted victims, says Ross.

It will also describe what families went through in terms of financial problems, emotional problems such as terror, isolation, betrayal and separation, and life-threatening conditions.

"We will also focus on the spirit of the Jewish people, some of whom organized soup kitchens, schools and synagogues under impossible circumstances," she says.

Participants will also learn about Israel as the Jewish homeland, the Exodus, the declaration of the State of Israel and the strong ties of the Jewish people to the Holy Land, whether they live there or support Israel from abroad.

"The Holocaust is part of our history, and in order for people with developmental disabilities to be full members of the community, they need to be informed," says Margolese, adding that volunteers will be trained to teach the course in order to ensure continuity of the program.

Sandy Keshen, Reena's executive director, says that every Jew needs to know and understand their history.

"We often see family put aside individuals who learn differently, and this diminishes them. I have seen a sense of 'Why am I excluded?'

"The two pieces to the program, which is open to anyone in the community, include providing an understanding of our history, and giving participants a sense of being part of our community," she says.

One of Canada's best-known political advisors, Ezrin served as chief of staff to former Ontario premier David Peterson and headed the federal unity office under former prime minister Pierre Trudeau. He has held a number of diplomatic posts in the consular offices in New York and Los Angeles and has also worked in the private sector.

He currently serves as vice-chair of the board of directors of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and is a member of the board of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. He also sits on the boards of a number of arts and business-related organizations.

CIJA has been in the planning stages for months. The initiative for a major restructuring of community advocacy efforts began with the creation of an emergency cabinet of prominent business leaders, including Gerald Schwartz (Onex), Larry Tanenbaum (Toronto Maple Leafs and Toronto Raptors), Stephen Reitman (Reitmans clothing), Brent Belzberg (Harrowston and Torquest Partners) and the late Izzy Asper (CanWest Global).

Operating under the auspices of United Israel Appeal (UIA) Federations Canada, the Jewish community's national fundraising and allocations arm, the emergency cabinet evolved into CIJA. Twelve cabinet members will be part of the CIJA board and another 18 people selected ad personam have been added.

The board will likely shrink to around 20 members after its first year, Ezrin said, adding that its members were selected in an attempt to reflect a broad geographic and age spectrum. They include Jim Spatz (Halifax), Daryl Katz (Edmonton), Mel Lazareck (Winnipeg), Stanley Plotnik, Mark Gold and Joseph Gabay (Montreal), Toby Abramsky (Kingston), Bernard Pinsky (Vancouver), Anne Golden, Michael Bukstein, Mark Waldman, Barbara Bank and Philip Reichman (Toronto). Steven Cummings (Montreal) and Belzberg (Toronto) will serve as CIJA co-chairs.

CIJA will be advised by a new community council that will consist of representatives of various Jewish organizations.

For its part, CIJA will have an oversight role regarding policy decisions by Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and the National Committee for Jewish Campus Life. It will determine the allocation of resources and whether resources are being used to achieve the policy goals set for the organizations.

CIJA will allocate a total of $10 million, which will be raised in the annual community campaigns and through CIJA's own campaign, Ezrin said.

He acknowledges there may be some skepticism about a grand reorganization and whether anything positive will come of it.

"Canadians are like [people] from Missouri," he said. "They want to be shown."

By this time next year, Ezrin believes the evidence will be in, and observers will be able to see quantitatively measurable advances in the Jewish community's position on a number of fronts. He said CIJA will have developed a visible profile among important policymakers and members of the media, and its affiliated organizations will be running programs that advance support for Israel and create alliances with other communities.

Also in a year's time, new CIJA-trained political action committees (PACs), will have added thousands of members across Canada, beginning a process of increasing the influence of grassroots Jewish activists in the formulation of policy in the country.

Ezrin believes the PACs will "fill in a void in our system."

For a donation of $18, participants will be trained to advocate effectively on Jewish community issues and will receive briefing papers "from the finest minds in the world.

"It's all about empowering our community and those not from the Jewish community... who share our values and interests," Ezrin said.

A number of non-Jews have become "alarmed by what they see in Europe as a new anti-Semitism, and without debating the causes of it, it's obvious and clear there is some degree of political correctness to anti-Semitism today," he said.

Behind the scenes, Ezrin expects Jewish agencies to create and strengthen ties to other community organizations, particularly where both communities share views on specific issues. For example, Ezrin said, that could mean an alliance with Muslim groups to oppose limitations on the ritual slaughter of animals and for public funding for faith-based schools in Ontario.

"The challenge and goal is to be able to shape the agenda of items we want people to work on. Advocacy in this area is to be proactive, to be externally based and to reach out to more people."

'Sukkah case' goes to Supreme Court

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

On Jan. 19, the Supreme Court of Canada will hear the appeal of a group of Montreal condominium owners who want the right to erect sukkot on their exterior property, despite having signed a contract that prohibits any construction in those areas.

They are residents of the Le Sanctuaire apartments, whose co-owners' association, the Syndicat Northcrest, has forbidden the building on balconies and patios of the temporary shelters associated with the week-long harvest festival of Sukkot. The dispute has been in Quebec courts since 1997, when the Syndicat first sought a temporary injunction against the installation of sukkot.

In 1998, Superior Court judge Andre Rochon granted the Syndicat a permanent injunction against the building of sukkot, citing the co-owners' contract.

The owners have not disputed this interpretation of the contract, but argue there was a sudden change in attitude by the Syndicat, which until 1997 had allowed the building of the temporary dwellings.

Constitutional lawyer Julius Grey, who is representing the group of six owners, headed by Moise Amselem, said he will argue that this is an issue of freedom of religion and that the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms overrides the declaration of co-ownership to which his clients are party.

The provincial charter says its protection against religious discrimination is "not limited to actions required by specific commands within a religion, but extends to the exercise of one's religion or conscience according to an honest and sincere belief."

"The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not apply here because there is no governmental involvement, but the Quebec charter does because it applies to any contract," Grey said. "The Quebec charter is a quasi-constitutional document that is supposed to be applied above all other matters. People can't sign away what that charter protects."

Grey said he will not be arguing that having a sukkah is obligatory in Judaism, but rather that the court should take into consideration the belief of the individual.

"It is not for the courts to decide what is the correct practice of a religion," he said.

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, a party to the case, will argue that courts have no business deciding the requirements of a religion. Its lawyer Steven Slimovitch said this is essentially what happened in Quebec Superior Court in 1998, when the judge heard conflicting testimonies from two rabbis serving as expert witnesses.

Rabbi Moise Ohana, spiritual leader of Congregation Or Hahayim, said in his testimony that putting up a sukkah is an essential practice in Judaism. But he said the offer by the Syndicat of one common sukkah at Le Sanctuaire, a large multi-building complex, did not fulfil this religious obligation because Sukkot is a festive holiday and, if one is inconvenienced by having to leave one's home to visit a sukkah, it detracts from the enjoyment and is, therefore, contrary to the religion.

McGill University Jewish studies professor and rabbi Barry Levy, the witness for the Syndicat, denied that erecting a sukkah was an obligation of Jewish law and is, rather, a tradition.

"The trial judge basically said he preferred Levy's version and ruled in favor of the [Syndicat]," said Slimovitch. "We don't believe any judge can decide what is the proper interpretation of any religious belief."

Hamilton body seeks to boost Jewish population

Hoping for 20% increase over 10 years

By ABIGAIL TATOR
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — At first she was reluctant to move to Hamilton, but Ellen Resnick is now involved in a campaign to convince more Jews to move to the city.

For five years, Resnick's husband commuted from Toronto to his office in Hamilton. After their youngest child went off to university, Resnick agreed to make the move to Dundas, a former suburb that is now part of the amalgamated City of Hamilton.

"I must say I am very pleasantly surprised. I am really enjoying it," said Resnick, who was born and raised in Toronto.

"I had this picture of it en route to Buffalo – the smoke stacks. But it really has beautiful geography. I had no idea Hamilton looked like this. I walk my dog and there are beautiful paths and parks."

Resnick, who moved at the end of the summer, was also delighted by the warmth and vibrancy of the Jewish community, which numbers about 5,000 people.

She said Shabbat dinner invitations have been forthcoming since the fall.

Resnick recently signed on to help coordinate GroHamilton, a committee started by UJA Federation of Hamilton whose goal is increasing the city's Jewish population by 20 per cent over the next 10 years.

"We have been attracting about 30 families a year, but we are losing people to death and people moving," said Wendy Schneider, the federation's head of community planning and communications.

The committee is especially targeting Toronto families who are looking for a more affordable lifestyle.

"Jewish education is cheaper, extracurricular activities are cheaper. And for the same price you would pay for a matchbox in Thornhill, you can get a beautiful home with a piece of property," Schneider said.

"Many Jewish families who find the cost of living in Toronto prohibitive are moving north, to Thornhill, Richmond Hill, Aurora, even Barrie," she said.

"Hamilton has a negative image. We want to reach these people before they make the move north and tell them to move west."

Schneider added that people who are commuting to Toronto from northern suburbs could just as easily commute from Hamilton by car or GO Train.

Liora Malka's husband commuted to his job in Hamilton for six years before his company's relocation to Brantford precipitated the family's move in 2001 to Ancaster, another suburb that is now part of the amalgamated city.

Malka said the biggest plus has been the programs for her kids. They have attended horseback riding camp, sports fitness camp and courses at the Dundas Valley School of Art, and they are involved in hockey and baseball.

The Jewish community features four synagogues, two Jewish day schools, two after-school religious programs, a Jewish community centre, a kosher butcher and delicatessen, Jewish social services and a Jewish home for the aged.

Since its establishment in 2002, the committee has secured $8,000 in grants, and it has also prepared a strategic plan and formed sub-committees, including retention, marketing and fundraising.

A McMaster University liaison committee is in charge of convincing graduate students and medical residents to stay in Hamilton when they are finished their programs.

"We are letting faculty know so they can entice those in the community to make a more permanent move to Hamilton," Schneider said.

"With all of the hospitals in Hamilton, it is a good place for anyone in health care – doctors, nurses, pharmacists. And we have a shortage of family doctors in the community."

The committee holds an annual barbecue to welcome new families, who also receive a welcome phone call and a copy of the Hamilton Jewish News.

The website jewishhamilton.org features links to job boards, testimonials from new residents and information on local services.

The committee hopes to have the same success as the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's Grow Winnipeg Campaign, which launched in 2001. That campaign attracted 85 families in 2002 and has projected 143 new families for 2003.

The GroHamilton committee expects to step up its campaign in the spring. Strategies will include ads in the Canadian Jewish News, a new Jewish Hamilton brochure, receptions in the Greater Toronto Area to encourage migration, employment mentoring and networking and young adult activities.

The committee will also solicit volunteers to mentor new families and hopes to work with the City of Hamilton in its effort to attract more skilled individuals to the city.

"We have everything you'd ever want within five minutes. The conservation areas are just beautiful. It's almost like living in the country because we've got fresh air," Malka said.

Hamiltonian Soifer 'was committed to his community'

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Samuel Soifer, recognized here as a scholar and quintessential volunteer, died last month at age 83.

When Soifer retired in 1985 after 11 years as executive director of the Jewish Federation of Hamilton, he went on to serve on numerous local boards and committees, including those of Shalom Village retirement and nursing home, the Jewish Federation of Hamilton and Beth Jacob Synagogue.

Obituary

Soifer played an integral role in the life of Beth Jacob, where he was a leader in bringing about egalitarian reforms. He also served as gabbai and regularly attended morning minyan.

Soifer also actively participated in several book groups and Jewish study groups, and he was a regular volunteer at Out of the Cold, helping provide food for the homeless and needy.

He served on the board of Raananah Park, a small Jewish communal settlement in Highland Mills, N.Y., where he organized and led the High Holy Day services for many years.

Soifer was born in New York City. He graduated from the City College of New York in 1940 and received an MA in Hebrew letters from the Jewish Theological Seminary's College of Jewish Studies, as well as a master's degree in social work from Columbia University in 1947.

His professional positions included being head of United Service Organizations (USO) in Harrisburg, Penn., director of the Jewish Community Center in Holyoke, Mass., and director of the Jewish federation in Des Moines, Iowa.

Carol Krames, director of Jewish Social Services, said she worked with Soifer on a number of projects, including helping to resettle the influx of Jews who came here from the former Soviet Union.

She said his death leaves a hole in the community that will be difficult to fill.

"He was an example to us all. He was a gentleman and a scholar and he was committed to his community."

Gloria Silverman, widow of the late Rabbi Israel Silverman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Jacob Synagogue, said, "On Shabbat mornings we pray for all who concern themselves with the needs of the community. Such a man was Sam Soifer. The Jewish community and each of its members was paramount to him and he never refused a request for help, be it an organization who wanted to take advantage of his organizational abilities or a Jew who needed a ride to shul or to make a minyan…Personally, I have lost a devoted friend and study partner."

Soifer's son, Aviam (Avi), described his father as "a very gentle man who lived life with zest. He was a man possessed of great wisdom and an amazing breadth of learning, yet he wore them very lightly.

"Nearly everyone who knew Sam Soifer thought of him as a real mensch. Those who got to know him best firmly believed that he also was a tzaddik."

Soifer's daughter Naira (Nonny) described him as "utterly without hypocrisy."

His daughter-in-law Marlene Booth wrote that "he lived life with appreciation and gusto, unbounded curiosity and a prophet's sense of outrage at injustice. He loved well and was very much loved."

Soifer leaves his wife of 62 years, Ahuva, and children Aviam (Avi), and daughter-in-law Marlene; Carmi; Naira (Nonny); and Eldon and daughter-in-law Lynn Loutzenhiser; as well as six grandchildren. He also leaves a sister, Blanche Mendelson.

JRH gets go-ahead for major expansion

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Health Minister Philippe Couillard has approved the Jewish Rehabilitation Hospital's (JRH) long-awaited $4.9-million expansion, which will add 24 beds to the current 120 and provide more space for its research and radiology departments.

It will be the first major expansion for the 48-year-old Laval institution since the 1995 completion of the Sandra and Leo Kolber Pavilion, an addition that did not increase the number of beds.

The new two-storey wing will be built on the hospital's west side, with construction beginning before April, the deadline set by the government, said Edna Mendelson, director of the JRH Foundation.

Although the government has given the green light to the project, it is not putting any money into it. The JRH will be taking out a $3.2 million loan with the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to cover most of the cost.

The JRH Foundation will contribute $710,000, raised largely by its golf tournaments, and the JRH itself will add $518,000 from its own building fund. The Maurice Pollack Foundation is giving $360,000 and the Canadian Foundation for Innovation is kicking in about $100,000.

The extra space will enable the JRH to eliminate its six-bed wards, said Mendelson. All rooms will have a maximum of two beds when the expansion is complete.

The new wing will house the hospital's renowned vestibular rehabilitation program, which is unique in Quebec.

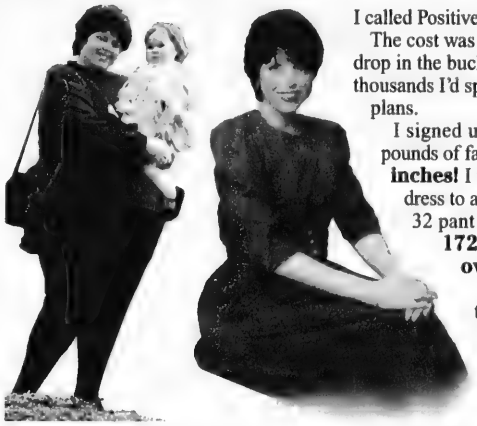
If I can lose 172 pounds, you can lose as much as you want to!

"My name is Kelly Kern. I'm a stockbroker. By age 30, I couldn't fit into an airplane seat. I was obese — fat beyond belief. I couldn't stop eating. Food was my comfort and support. I lived on fast foods and sweets.

People were always staring at me or snickering. The children were the worst. They are so dreadfully honest. "Mommy, look at that fat lady." That killed me.

I tried every fad diet. I once lost 80 pounds on a liquid fast. It was incredibly expensive. I ached from deprivation. I gained it all back and then some.

I saw an ad about weight loss with hypnosis. It sounded hokey — too good to be true. But I was desperate.



Kelly Before and After Hypnosis

I called Positive Changes Hypnosis.

The cost was amazingly low — a drop in the bucket compared to the thousands I'd spent on national diet plans.

I signed up and took off 172 pounds of fat. That's over 100 inches! I went from a size 26 dress to a size 10, from a size 32 pant to a size 14. I lost 172 pounds in just over two years.

I have easily maintained my trim shape for four years since I began the program. I'm convinced my weight loss is for good. I would not go back to the way I was — not for a million dollars.

If I hadn't gone to Positive Changes Hypnosis, I'd still be 354 lbs. or more and miserable. DON'T LET THAT HAPPEN TO YOU. CALL NOW!"

Putting Their Heads Together

After almost sixty years, Leo and Doris Shack are still happiest when they're together. So when computer classes began in October at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, they quickly staked out side-by-side seats in the brand-new Computer Learning & Resource Centre.

"We took a course at the library and we had to share a computer," Doris says. "This is much better." Twelve senior-friendly workstations give the couple freedom to try new things, and their patient instructor, Dianne Erdos-Rush, lets them raise questions they were intimidated to ask elsewhere.

"She never makes anyone feel like, 'you're asking this again?!'" says Doris. But Dianne credits their partnership: "They help each other along. One guides the other; one [may be] stronger in one aspect, the other…in another."

The Shacks first met as teenagers and married when he finished his medical internship. "At Harbord, if you did well, you went into medicine or pharmacy," Leo says. Doris graduated as an occupational therapist and worked in Hawaii and California while Leo did his pediatric residency there.

Returning to Toronto, Doris raised their children, then returned to work, heading Bloorview's Occupational Therapy department until Leo's practice needed her sixteen years later.

There, they worked together until bypass surgery three years ago convinced Leo to retire, a move probably more difficult for his patients than for him. He recalls that they sometimes kept coming even after they had long outgrown a "baby doctor."

It was time for a new phase. "We became seniors," says Leo, who recently turned 77. Not that they feel less vibrant. They first thought the Betel Centre was "only for old people," but since joining, have seen all it offers, including art, lectures – and computers.

Doris had used their office computer, but was never entirely comfortable. "I knew how to do 'the program,'" for billing OHIP. "I thought I was hot stuff," she jokes, until she got the computer home and realized how little she knew. "I was fiddling with it, but didn't use it as part of my life."

Leo had done even less: "I ran the office; I didn't have to know anything." So they signed up for a Thursday evening be-ginners' course.

Their sentences blend with easy familiarity as he admits how challenging just learning the mouse was. "I can use it very well now," he says, but it's taken more hand-eye coordination than he thought. Doris jokes, "Lucky you weren't a surgeon."

"It's very levelling," she adds. "You're running your life, a business," and then, with computers, "you're just like a kid." But the Betel Centre makes it a positive experience: "It's a very good atmosphere."

Finding time isn't easy. Between theatre, fitness, and visits to three children – "all PhDs, married to PhDs," says Doris – and grandchildren, the pair are always in motion. This month, they're off to California, and Doris says, "I'm mad because we have to miss computers."

At home, the couple schedule "appointments" to practice. "We're not as chicken as we were." They told Dianne their computer is starting to feel like "more than just a piece of furniture."

"I don't give them too much jargon," says Dianne. She focuses on basic terms: "minimize, maximize…they're comfortable with those words now." Most important, they "have a wonderful time together and have come so far."

Says Doris, "we may be unique," spending so much time together, but they would encourage others, married or single, to "not wait as long as we did," to take computer classes, and enjoy retirement.

"We've shared a lot in a very natural kind of way," Doris says. "Learning something new is always good."

She and Leo are probably less unique than they think; seven other couples have taken computer classes since October. Says Doris, "If both are at the same level, it's great to start together." Or, as Dianne says, when it comes to seniors learning computers, "two heads are definitely better than one!"

Tallan honoured for studies on Jewish women

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Cheryl Tallan has nine grandchildren – two were born recently – and she dotes on each one. But in one major respect, she is completely unlike a typical grandmother.

Tallan, 68, is a specialist in the history of Jewish women. She was recently honoured, in New York City, for her expertise in that growing field.

She and two colleagues, Emily Taitz and Sondra Henry, were selected by the National Jewish Book Awards as finalists in the category of women's studies.

Their book, The Jewish Publication Society Guide To Jewish Women: 600 B.C.E. – 1900 C.E., was published in an updated version in 2003.

Tallan, who holds a master's degree in interdisciplinary studies from York University, believes it is the only volume of its kind to deal with Jewish women's experiences in Asia, Africa, Europe and the Americas.

Taitz and Henry, who originally wrote the book, chose Tallan as a collaborator because of her knowledge of talmudic laws relating to women.

"I was also the one who checked out the complete bibliography and kept track of the new books and articles that continued to be published while we were compiling and writing our own material," she explained.

According to Tallan, the rights and status of women were never an issue throughout most of Jewish history.

"Very often," she said, "women picked up extra privileges because of a specific problem or law directed at fixing another problem."

And surprisingly, perhaps, Jewish women had more rights in ancient times.

"If we look at certain situations, it sometimes seems that women had more power in the households of medieval or ancient Jewish communities than they had in early modern times.

"That was because women's work was a necessary component of the home, and the home was then the economic unit. When that changed, women's opportunities often became more limited."

Cheryl Tallan

A 1957 University of Toronto graduate with majors in physiology and biochemistry, Tallan was drawn to the topic in the early 1980s.

"I felt there was a great lack of knowledge of the history of Jewish women. And at the high school and university levels, there were either no, or very few, courses on Jewish women."

Today such courses are offered at Jewish high schools and universities, and many books and scholarly articles on the subject have been published.

Tallan, the mother of four children, was born in Toronto. Her father, Sam Lapedes, was a union organizer. Her mother, Becky, was a political activist.

After earning her university degree, she was a lab assistant at the U of T's department of zoology. There she met her husband, Irv, now a retired professor of genetics.

Following the birth of her first child, she devoted herself to raising a family. Once her children – Martin, David, Shauna and Debra – were sufficiently old enough, she took a course in Jewish studies at the U of T.

"In school, I had learned English and Canadian history," she explained, "but that was not my history. As a Jew, I wanted to learn more about Jewish history and Jewish thought. And I wanted to learn Hebrew so I could read the classics."

For her master's thesis, Tallan investigated the status of Jewish widows during the medieval era.

"At certain times and in certain places," she noted, "widows could have more freedom of action than either married or single women. But of course, there were many poor widows who were dependent on their children or on the charity of the community."

With an M.A. in hand, she started a Ph.D at the U of T's department of Near and Mideastern Civilizations.

She has yet to complete her doctorate dissertation. "At the moment I'm not working on it, and I'm listed as a lapsed Ph.D student. But I hope to finish it someday."

While working on her doctorate degree, Tallan spent a year at the Hebrew University immersing herself in medieval Jewish history and philosophy.

She was in Israel when the 1991 Gulf War broke out. Many of her fellow overseas students left, but she stayed on. "I was not really frightened. I did not believe [Iraq] would fire missiles at Jerusalem." (She was right).

Currently, in conjunction with other scholars, Tallan is busy writing several academic articles for an Israeli encyclopedia about Jewish women. It will be published on a CD-ROM.

'You need to dialogue with the other side'

Shalom-Salam was founded after Hina and Miriam Yosowich met last year in a class taught by Prof. Saeed Rahnema called "War and Peace in the Middle East." Rahnema encouraged the two women to work together because of their different perspectives.

Despite having no Palestinian background (her father is Turkish and her mother is south Asian), Hina has been an outspoken advocate for the Palestinians on campus. Miriam, who was born in Germany to Russian-Israeli parents, considers herself a Zionist.

"In Islam, as long as you're a Muslim, there is a brotherhood, or sisterhood, among you," Hina said, adding that as a Muslim, she felt compelled to take on the Palestinian cause.

"But I don't see why I have to hate the other side to be pro-Palestinian," she added.

"As a Zionist, last year at York was horrific," Miriam said. "This group has allowed me to come together with different people in order to see that we're all very much the same."

Iranian-born Rahnema, who initiated the group, explained that the students are working hard to find common ground. In the process, they also learn lessons about real negotiation.

"For war, you don't need agreements. If you really want to work towards peace, you need to dialogue with the other side," Rahnema said.

That means the group doesn't challenge the views of its members, and each individual is free to belong to any other organization, even those that endorse violence, as long as they don't bring those views with them into Shalom-Salam's discussions.

Within a campus atmosphere where students debate bi-national (one state) and two-state solutions for Israel and the Palestinians and potential borders are regularly redrawn, the group has struggled to find a lowest common denominator that all its members can agree on.

Rather than focus on issues of statehood, Shalom-Salam has chosen to direct its attention to "people's rights to live free of violence," Jonathan said.

"It's not that our group doesn't recognize Israel, it's that we've decided not to recognize anyone."

According to Shalom-Salam's brochures, the group's mission is to "create, facilitate and promote an atmosphere of mutual respect and tolerance as well as peaceful co-existence between Jewish/Israeli and Arab/Palestinian students within the York community."

Group members say they haven't decided to ignore what's going on in the world. They've just accepted the fact that no matter how much they yell, they won't resolve the Middle East conflict. So instead of pouring their energy into bringing in speakers to represent views that others find offensive, Hina, Miriam and the rest of the group's nine-member executive spend their time developing strategies and language to bring students together. They are currently in the process of writing a constitution that will guide future members.

Problems are resolved as they come up, Jonathan explained. For example, after the group's e-mail was used to discuss a controversial issue that left several members angry, it was decided that all personal opinions should be expressed on other Internet sites. Shalom-Salam's e-mail would be limited to material related only to the group.

Pro-Palestinians argue that al-Durrah was shot by an Israeli soldier, while supporters of Israel blame a Palestinian sniper.

According to Jonathan, arguing only increased the divide. He said he's learned to simply express regret over what happened.

"I guess we've agreed to be vague on many issues to reduce the tension. That way we can get together with students, even when we don't agree with them," Jonathan said.

In order to maintain balance on the executive, Nasir said the group is considering having Muslim students nominate the four Jewish members and Jewish students nominate the Muslim ones. The neutral member would be someone both sides can support.

"We haven't finalized anything," Nasir said. "But we're trying to avoid having radicals come in with their friends and try to take over the group."

While many academics familiar with the group support it, others worry that by reducing discussion about the Mideast to a level of discourse acceptable to both sides, Jewish students must adopt language that assumes there is a moral equivalency and a "cycle of violence." From there, they say, it isn't hard to also dismiss the need for Israel's existence.

Jonathan said he understands this concern. But he's tired of debating with extremists and would rather be spending his time meeting and socializing with students who can discuss issues in a civilized way.

He said he's experienced all kinds of anti-Semitism at York – from one student telling him that "you Jews think you own the world, but I know what you're doing" to other students unabashedly supporting suicide bombing.

But there have also been rewarding moments.

He recalled one day last term when both Hillel and the group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) set up tables in York's Central Square. A member of SPHR came over to his table and they started talking.

"In the end, he signed the petition condemning suicide bombing that Hillel was sending to the United Nations," Jonathan said, and then added quietly, "There are always these little moments that make me happy."

Shalom-Salam is scheduled to have its first big event on Jan. 14. Prof. Michael Bell, former Canadian ambassador to Egypt, Israel and Jordan, is the planned speaker.

McGill peace program receives $4.4 million CIDA grant

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The future of a McGill University-based program devoted to fostering constructive relations between Arabs and Jews in the Middle East has been assured with the approval of a $4.4 million grant from the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA).

The grant to the McGill Middle East program in civil society and peace building (MMEP) was authorized by outgoing International Co-operation Minister Susan Whelan in October and just recently accepted by McGill, says founding director of MMEP, Jim Torczyner.

It will be paid out over three years, he said.

Torczyner said he was delighted with the CIDA grant, which is more than the $3 million requested. "The government became convinced that the program is worthwhile, that it's one of a kind and has survived the terrible situation in the Middle East."

The money will enable four Israelis (including a Bedouin), six Palestinians and three Jordanians to come to McGill next April, the first such group here since the 2000-2001 academic year.

The grant was made with the proviso that the MMEP become self-sustaining within three years, he said.

CIDA was the chief sponsor of the MMEP for its first five years, contributing a total of $3.5 million, $3 million of which MMEP was required to match mostly through private fundraising. Torczyner said the $4.4 million grant does not have to be matched.

The MMEP brings together Israelis (both Jewish and Arab), Palestinians and Jordanians to study in a special post-graduate social work program at McGill for one year. In the second year, they are placed in one of five practice centres in East and West Jerusalem, Be'er Sheva, Nablus and Amman and work to improve social conditions.

Torczyner said the MMEP will still have to raise $360,000. This is to cover the costs of the Israeli students ($210,000) and the MMEP's work in Israel because CIDA does not consider Israel a developing country, as well as to fund a new aspect of the program, the addition of five Canadian students ($150,000).

Torczyner wants three Arab-speaking and two Hebrew-speaking Canadians to participate with the next group, following the same course of study and working in the Middle East in their second year.

Torczyner said he is disappointed McGill decided that it will not fund the Canadians and that the money must be found elsewhere.

As for whether the MMEP is likely to be able to support itself within three years, Torczyner said, "My hope is that the situation (between the Palestinians and Israel) will have improved enough by then in order that we can continue."

Although CIDA is not funding the Israelis, it has agreed to sponsor an Israeli Bedouin participant for the first time, as well as a staff position at the West Jerusalem practice centre specifically assigned to work on peace-building.

Israel to reject the Hague court's authority on fence

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will inform the International Court of Justice in The Hague that it rejects its authority to deliberate on the building of the separation fence, senior political sources in Jerusalem said Sunday.

Nevertheless, the sources said, Israel's statement to the ICJ will also present substantial arguments to justify the security need for the fence. These will also help Israel in a future campaign against any negative ruling made by the court.

On Dec. 8, the UN General Assembly assigned the ICJ the task of formulating an opinion on "the legal implications of building a wall in occupied Palestinian territory." The court's opinion has no binding validity, but if it rules against the construction of the fence for legal reasons, Israel will suffer significant political and public relations damage.

The ICJ hearing on the fence will be on Feb. 23, and it has called for arguments in writing by Jan. 30. Israel is sending the written statement, but has yet to decide whether to appear at the hearing itself.

The political leadership thinks the court will rule against Israel and the government's legal advisers have been divided on how to act.

Foreign Ministry jurists suggest making do with rejecting the court's authority to deliberate the issue, without getting into substantial issues and affording legitimacy to the process. Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom tends not to accept this position.

Jurists at the Prime Minister's Bureau and Defence Ministry also suggested rejecting the court's authority on the issue, but recommended that Israel also submit its reasons for building the fence.

The legal advisers argue that The Hague case should not be viewed only from a legal standpoint, or in terms of the chances for its success. They said it must also be seen from a political and public relations perspective.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz's military secretary, Brig.-Gen. Mike Herzog, argued that Israel has a case, and that presenting its position in The Hague could be beneficial further down the road.

As an example, he cited the decision to cooperate with the Mitchell Committee, which investigated the causes of the intifadah outbreak. Mofaz supports Herzog's opinion.

A special team of jurists has been set up to formulate Israel's statement to the ICJ. The work is being coordinated by Meir Rosen, a former legal adviser to the Foreign Ministry who was also Israel's ambassador in Washington. The team's recommendations will be presented to the inner cabinet for approval.

International jurist Prof. Daniel Bethlehem of Cambridge University will represent Israel in the court. Bethlehem was in Israel last week and joined the team of Israeli jurists for working sessions under his guidance. Bethlehem also met the foreign minister and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's bureau chief, Dov Weisglass.

Bethlehem, an expert in international law who has appeared before the ICJ on numerous occasions, has also advised Israel on a number of sensitive issues in recent years, helping it formulate its position for the Mitchell Committee.

In 2002, he influenced the government to block the appointment of an international commission of inquiry into the battle in the Jenin refugee camp during Operation Defensive Shield.

The jurists also met and consulted with American jurist Prof. Alan Dershowitz, who visited Israel last week.

During a meeting last week with members of the Public Council for the Construction of the Separation Fence, a defence ministry source said that stages A and B of the construction of the separation fence have led to the annexation of 1.7 per cent – some 60 square kilometres – of the West Bank. On the fence's completion at the end of 2005, around six per cent – some 200 square kilometres – of the West Bank will lie within Israel. Figures from the Defence Ministry also show that the fence's deviation east of the June 1967 lines, from Salem to Elkana, has led to the annexation of some 15,000 Palestinians. This population includes residents of Baka al-Sharkiye, as well as Palestinians residing in Israel illegally.

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Edgar Bronfman

NEW YORK — The European Union (EU) is encouraging anti-Semitism for political reasons, says World Jewish Congress (WJC) president Edgar Bronfman in an article that appeared Monday in the Financial Times.

In the article, Bronfman writes that the European Union is guilty of anti-Semitism by both action and inaction. He charges that the EU has hidden the fact that most of the world's violent anti-Semitic acts occurring outside Israel have taken place in Western Europe, an omission that "reeked of intellectual dishonesty and moral treachery."

Bronfman adds that the EU "first released a flawed and dangerously inflammatory poll which purported to name Israel the greatest threat to world peace. Then it cancelled a study commissioned by its own monitoring centre that reported on the involvement of Muslim minorities in incidents of mounting European anti-Semitism.

"Let us not mince words," the article continues. "Both of these actions were politically motivated, demonstrating a failure of real decency. The Talmud teaches that silence implies agreement, and that is why we will not rest until every European parliamentarian, member state, and intergovernmental body has a copy of this report in their hands.

"Democracies are not judged by how they treat current or future majorities," Bronfman says, "but by how they treat their minorities."

Bronfman's article appeared as part of a comprehensive plan of action by the WJC against anti-Semitism in Europe. A WJC delegation is set to meet next week with Jewish community activists in France and Great Britain to discuss ways of putting an end to anti-Semitism.

Rabbinical panel considers Orthodox attitudes toward gays

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Fear and denial have always characterized the relationship of the Orthodox and haredi community toward homosexuals in their midst. But in the past two years, there have been signs that the communities are more willing to recognize and come to terms with the phenomenon.

One of these signs is that for the first time, Orthodox rabbis convened in Jerusalem last week to discuss their attitude to homosexuality. The discussion took place as part of an international conference marking the 20th anniversary of the Amiel Institute for rabbinic training.

The purpose of the conference was to deal with a wide range of challenges facing rabbis outside of Israel in the post-modern age, among them homosexuality. The session dealing with the issue was hidden behind a non-committal name: "Bringing hearts closer in a time of modern questions."

The director of the Amiel Institute, Rabbi Eliyahu Birnbaum, said the subject was placed on the agenda because of a growing number of questions from rabbis about how to deal with congregational members who have revealed their same-sex tendency.

"The phenomenon itself has, of course, always existed," Rabbi Birnbaum said. "The new element is that more declared homosexuals than ever before are seeking to be active in the community."

He noted the case of a rabbi in a European congregation who was approached by a group of young religious homosexuals who requested to study with him. "His response, in one word, was 'shock,'" Rabbi Birnbaum said.

"How should one behave toward a person who openly declares himself homosexual," asked the session's chair, Rabbi Shai Freundlich of Uruguay.

"Should we tell him to go to the doctor, or offer him love and warmth? Should we sweep the problem under the rug, or should we try to understand and deal with it?"

Rabbi Steve Greenberg, of New York's Klal Institute, said: "To the best of my knowledge, this is the first time that Orthodox rabbis are publicly and seriously discussing this issue."

Rabbi Greenberg was the guiding light behind the film Trembling Before God, which told the stories of Orthodox homosexual men and women in Israel, the United States, and Great Britain.

He said he has received many requests from Orthodox and haredi rabbis to watch the movie in private.

"Many people told us that seeing the movie made them change their minds and accept homosexuality as a non-controllable human condition and not as a social act or a disease," Rabbi Greenberg said.

"Halachah does not specifically oppose same-sex tendencies, however, there is an express prohibition in the Torah against anal intercourse."

Lesbian sexual relations are also considered unacceptable, although to a lesser extent than male homosexuality, Rabbi Greenberg said.

"The sin of homosexual relations is no more serious than adultery, for example," said Rabbi Bernard Weinstein, who is also a psychiatrist, in his lecture on the medical aspects of homosexuality. "However, in spite of the identical seriousness of both transgressions, the relationship to each is different."

Willingness to discuss homosexuality has increased not only among the Orthodox, but also among haredim, Rabbi Weinstein said, but the accepted attitude is still based on the assumption that homosexuality is a tendency that can be changed.

"Most therapists believe that this assumption is not correct," he noted.

Rabbi Weinstein also discussed homophobia, which he called "the tendency to define feeling of hatred toward homosexuals as complying with mitzvot of the Torah."

He said he believed that this tendency revealed a problem in the soul of the hater. "It is much easier to see oneself as fulfilling a religious commandment than as suffering from a psychological problem," he said.

"Homophobia is a phenomenon that exists in any society where there is a clear differentiation between the functions of men and women," he said.

"Until Orthodoxy deals with the question of the status of women, this problem will not be solved. But even if halachah itself does not change, straight people in the Orthodox community can still show understanding and compassion for those who are different from themselves. One can be ultra-Orthodox and still believe that homosexuality is between a person and God."

By EHUD GOL

Comment

As the Italian presidency of the Council of the European Union began in July 2003, there were expectations of a more balanced European approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Now, as the Italian tenure draws to an end, we can evaluate whether the presidency lived up to those expectations, despite all the difficulties and obstacles along the way.

A clear-cut answer to this question was given to anyone participating in the trilateral press conference held by the foreign ministers of Italy, Israel and the Palestinian Authority at the end of the donors' conference in Rome last month.

Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi is widely credited with changing Italy's policies to be more understanding of Israel's position in the Middle East.

One needed only to listen to the compliments heaped by PA Foreign Minister Nabil Sha'ath on his colleague Franco Frattini, the Italian foreign minister, regarding Italy's balanced and inspired policy in order to understand the extent to which the Italians succeeded for the first time in the history of the EU in leading a fair and balanced foreign policy.

Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom also complimented the Italian presidency. Indeed, Italy has shown how a balanced policy can turn into an influential and reconciling factor when it takes into account the constraints and needs of both sides to the conflict.

For the first time in years, we saw a presidency that completely liberated itself from the megaphone policy that was characteristic of its predecessors. That policy had manifested itself in frequent criticism of Israel, including diplomatic protests over any event, imaginary or real, in which Europe felt a condemnation of Israel could serve its own position in the Arab world – at Israel's expense.

Italy never hesitated to apply its influence and pressure in order for Europe to finally decide to include Hamas on its list of terror organizations. At the United Nations, Italy co-ordinated its actions with Israel and with other countries in order to avoid making a mockery of the organization in the face of a stream of condemnations of Israel.

Italy's efforts were not always successful, but if the co-ordination mechanism with Italy becomes a model for future Israeli collaboration with Europe, this will constitute a major achievement.

During its six-month presidency, Italy continued to maintain its communication channels on the bilateral level with both the Arab countries in the Middle East and Israel, including an impressive series of visits at the highest levels.

Italy ended its presidency with an additional show of courage, as it included a condemnation of anti-Semitism in the EU's final declaration. Italy has certainly understood that this plague will not only harm its Jewish victims, but will also shake the foundations of Europe itself.

In conclusion, over the course of the coming months, there will probably be politicians, diplomats and other experts who will analyze the actions and ramifications of the Italian presidency in regard to the European Convention and the expansion to 25 member states. In the meantime, we can conclude that as far as the Middle East is concerned, the Italian presidency was managed in a skillful and fair manner and deserves the highest compliments from all those concerned in our region.

Prince backs Sharon

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is a pragmatic leader who has no Palestinian peace partner, a former heir to the Jordanian throne says. Prince Hassan bin Talal, uncle of Jordan's King Abdullah, made his comments to an Italian newspaper in a report published last week. "[PA President] Arafat is at a transitory stage, but unfortunately we can see the growing influence of Hamas and Hezbollah among the Palestinians," Hassan said.

Rise in N.A. Aliyah

Aliyah from North America rose by 20 per cent in 2003, with some 2,400 people from the United States and Canada moving to Israel. Support for Israel during the intifadah, grants to new immigrants, a weak North American economy and improved co-ordination between the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and the Jewish state account for the increase over 2002, said Michael Landsberg, JAFI's director of North American aliyah.

Water Hazard

Much of Tel Aviv's drinking water is unpotable and Israel's drinking water reservoirs in general are largely unfit for human consumption, according to the Environmental Poverty Report 2003, presented by Adam, Teva v'Din, the Israel Union for Environmental Defence. As well, air pollution in several Israeli cities has reached carcinogenic levels, the report says. The document is the first to assess the magnitude of environmental hazards in Israel.

Israel Targeted at UN

Syria last week proposed a UN Security Council resolution to rid the Middle East of weapons of mass destruction. The resolution, which comes after Libya's recent commitment to end its programs for developing weapons of mass destruction, is a veiled attempt to target Israel, UN diplomats say. But it's unclear whether the resolution will come to a vote, as Syria is in its final days on the Security Council as a rotating representative of the Arab group.

New Shooting Rules?

The Israel Defence Forces may change its orders about opening fire along the West Bank separation fence after the recent shooting of demonstrators in which Israeli Gil Na'amati and an American were wounded, IDF Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon said. "This is an incident that had very serious consequences," Ya'alon told the Knesset's foreign affairs and security committee. "But in the IDF, there is no policy of shooting at protesters. IDF troops shoot only when life is endangered."

Poverty levels up among Israeli children: report

By JONATHAN LIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Nearly half of Israel's children – 40 per cent – live in poverty, squalor or delinquency, while another 30 per cent could slip into a similar fate and only 30 per cent could be said to have a "happy" childhood, according to the National Council for the Child's statistical yearbook.

Children in Israel 2003 paints a grim picture of childhood and youth in Israel, showing an increase over recent years in the number of poor children, children addicted to drugs and alcohol, and victims of violence and abuse.

"Israeli society is deluding itself if it thinks it can give up 40 per cent of its children who are the citizens of its future," Yitzhak Kadman, the council's director, said last week as he presented the yearbook to Israeli President Moshe Katsav.

"There is no chance Israeli society will be able to exist in 20 years, standing on the spindly legs of 30 per cent of its children. This criminal negligence of a considerable portion of Israel's children who are living in poverty, sickness and neglect is going to cost the state dearly in every way," Kadman said.

Close to a third of Israel's children (30 per cent) were below the poverty line – including those in east Jerusalem, they number 656,000. Despite fluctuations in the percentage of poor children through the 1990s, there was a clear rise in the number living in poverty.

More than half (54 per cent) of non-Jewish children live below the poverty line, which is 2½ times higher than the percentage of Jewish children in the same situation (20 per cent).

The higher the social and economic standard of a town or community, the fewer children live there. In the poorest communities, children make up 60 per cent of the population, compared to just 22 per cent in wealthier ones.

In Bnei Brak, 51 per cent of children are poor. In the capital (not including east Jerusalem), 38 per cent are below the poverty line, as are 33 per cent in Ashdod.

By contrast, in both Ramat Gan and Rishon Lezion, only about nine per cent of children live below the poverty line.

The number of children living on income supplement has risen 220 per cent since 1995. More than 300,000 children live in families receiving supplements from the National Insurance Institute.

The report also shows a startling rise in crime among minors and in young victims of violence and assault. Between 1990 and 2002, the number of cases reaching Youth Court rose by 50 per cent, from 6,655 to 10,021.

Since 1995 the number of minors suspected of offences increased from about eight per cent to nine per cent in 2002, and 34,000 minors were suspected of criminal offences, about half of them involving violence.

New immigrant teens, whose numbers have tripled since 1993, comprise 13 per cent of the population, but 24 per cent of minors suspected of criminality. Most of the teenagers involved are aged 12 to 15.

Of the suspected new cases involving minors, 41 per cent are non-Jewish youth, and more than 90 per cent of these were for security offences. Police received reports of 2,887 minors cited for violence in educational institutions in the past year.

Jews made up 68 per cent of children born in Israel at the end of 2002. In 2003, 70 per cent of the children in Israel were Jewish, compared to 75 per cent in 1995.

Israeli society is growing older, the report says. At the end of 2002 the state's 2,219,200 children made up 34 per cent of the population, compared to 39 per cent in 1970. The average number of children per family has dwindled consistently since 1980, from 2.7 to 2.3 children in 2002, and the number of single-child families has doubled.

Some 141,737 of the children living in Israel do not have full Israeli citizenship – 71 per cent live in east Jerusalem, while 29 per cent are children of legal foreign workers in Israel, children of immigrants of unclear status, and children from marriages between Israeli Arabs and Palestinians.

Israel's population is 6.7 million

By MOTI BASSOK
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's population at the start of 2004 stands at some 6,750,000 people. In addition, there are around 250,000 foreigners living here, some of them for extended periods.

According to the Central Bureau of Statistics, 81 per cent of the population – 5,450,000 people – are Jews. This includes 290,000 new immigrants who are not recognized by the Interior Ministry as Jews. The remaining 19 per cent of the population are Arabs.

The year 2003 saw the smallest growth in population in 13 years – 116,000 people, or 1.7 per cent. This is attributed for the most part to the slowdown in immigration, which in the past year constituted only nine per cent of the population increase, as opposed to 38 per cent in 2000. Only 23,000 new immigrants came to Israel in 2003 as opposed to 34,000 in 2002.

Coming to America was often harder than expected

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, Jews in Europe called America "the goldene medine," the golden land. They thought everything there was wonderful, that everyone was wealthy and life was perfect.

When they arrived, though, they found things were often very hard, and they had to work and live in difficult conditions.

Nevertheless, compared to life in Europe, especially for Jews, it was at least a safe haven.

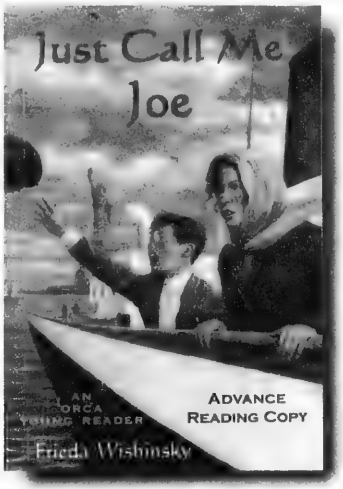
Frieda Wishinsky writes about one little boy's experiences in Just Call Me Joe (Orca, 2003) with sensitivity and understanding.

Joseph and Anna came to America from Russia to escape the soldiers who constantly threatened Jews. Their parents only had enough money to send the two of them. The idea was for Joseph to go to school and for Anna to get a job, and eventually they would earn enough money to send for their parents.

They lived with their Aunt Sophie and her boarders. Her home was very crowded and very hot.

Joe had a hard time. Because he knew no English, for a while he was put in a Grade 1 class, though he should have been in Grade 4, and the older boys teased him for being in a "baby class." When he finally made friends with some boys on the street – Sam, Al and Lou – they tried to make him skip school and join them in their adventures, which were often against the law.

Joe desperately wanted to fit in and be a real American. For a long time, he thought that joining his friends in what they were doing would make him one.



Luckily, he remembered the lessons his father had taught him and realized that going to school was a much better choice.

Anna, meanwhile, was thoroughly miserable. She had a job working in a clothing factory, but the owners treated her and the other workers quite badly. The pay was low, and anyone could be fired without a good reason.

Besides, she missed her parents and her life in Russia desperately.

Joe was a very bright child, and it wasn't too long before his teacher asked him to help a younger boy with his schoolwork. The boy, Avrum, saw Joe as his hero, which bothered Joe, since he was still trying to decide whether to join his friends in their misbehaviour.

His teacher gave him a very difficult poem to read and a book to practice with. When Sam found out that Joe preferred to go to school rather than go see the Brooklyn Bridge, he punched Joe in the face.

Still, Joe went to school. When he read the poem, he noticed that the principal was in the room. He was very afraid, but afterward the principal took him around the school and told him that he would from then on be in Grade 4, where he was supposed to be.

When he got home and told his Aunt Sophie what had happened, she was very happy too. Then Anna came in and said she had become involved in the struggle for better working conditions at the factory. In doing so, she found she could speak in front of a group and that people actually listened to what she had to say.

Finally, things seemed to be going their way.

Just Call Me Joe shows what it was like for newcomers to America, depicting their dreams, hopes and struggles, as well as the ultimate realization that life here could be good.

Photographer's book deconstructs the Diaspora

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For 25 years, like a man possessed, Frederic Brenner roamed the globe photographing Jews in more than 40 countries on five continents.

As he immersed himself in its historical, cultural and religious complexities, he discovered that the Diaspora, far from being a homogeneous monolith, is in fact an incredibly varied universe.

"A Jew, I learned, is not the stereotypical white European Ashkenazi male," he writes in his newly published two-volume magnum opus, Diaspora: Homelands in Exile (HarperCollins).

"A Jew can be a policeman in Gibraltar or an Iranian rug merchant in Montclair, N.J., as well as a banker from Spain… who now lives in England. A Jew is also Ralph Lauren and Barbra Streisand and Henry Kissinger."

"The narrative of Jews in the 20th century was written from an Ashkenazic point of view," he explained in an interview. "My book remedies this."

Containing 264 bold, eye-catching black-and-white photographs, as well as erudite commentaries by leading contemporary writers, Diaspora may well be the most exhaustive visual anthology of its kind in the English language.

He described Diaspora as "an inclusive portrait of all the threads comprising the fabric of one people, Klal Yisrael."

"We live in a pivotal moment in time," he said. "There have been more changes in Jewish history in the last 50 years than in the past 500 years."

He cited the Holocaust, the birth of Israel and the exodus of Jews from Arab lands, the former Soviet Union, the Balkans and Ethiopia.

As a result of these upheavals, he explained, 70 per cent of the subjects in his photographs have immigrated to greener pastures elsewhere.

Brenner, who was raised in an assimilated home, happened upon his vocation while visiting Israel in 1978 at the age of 18.

Wandering through the haredi neighbourhood of Mea Shearim, he discovered "a shtetl in the Middle East, a Diaspora in the heart of Jerusalem."

The inhabitants of Mea Shearim, he observes in Diaspora, were emblematic of the Diaspora. They ignited in him "a desire to explore this paradox more fully."

At this point, Brenner had no intention of becoming a photographer. But as he continued his travels to the farthest corners of the Diaspora, armed with such cameras as a Leica and an 8x10 Sinar, he gradually realized he had a mission to fulfill.

"Maybe photography wanted me," he mused.

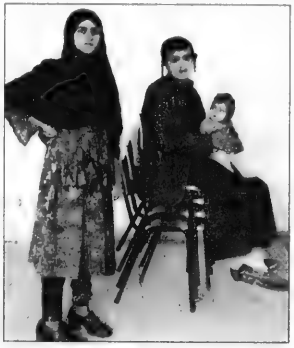
As he readily conceded, he could not have undertaken this project without the financial assistance of major sponsors. They run the gamut from Montreal businessman and philanthropist Charles Bronfman and the Cummings Foundation to Hollywood mogul Steven Spielberg and the American Joint Distribution Committee.

"They truly empowered me to dream my dream," he said.

Brenner, who holds a master's degree in social anthropology from the Écoles des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales in Paris, has visited some of the world's most remote destinations and conversed with some of the most exotic of Jews.

He has been to Yemen, deep in Arabia, whose Jewish community has been dispersed to the far ends of the earth. He has met crypto-Jews in Portugal who masquerade as Catholics. He has encountered Jews in Ethiopia whose pre-Talmudic practices have long vanished from mainstream Jewry.

On a more prosaic level, Brenner also photographed a haredi family in Montreal. (Photographs of Toronto's Jewish community didn't make the final cut).



Yemenite Jews in Israel, 1993

Brenner, whose previous books include Israel and Jews/America/A Representation, appears to have struck gold with Diaspora.

"It has been a phenomenal success in the United States," said Martha Watson, the publicity director of HarperCollins in Toronto.

And Diaspora has been published in France, Germany, Britain and Holland, and been given lavish spreads in Germany's Stern magazine and France's Le Monde.

Exhausted from years of travel, Brenner has no immediate plans to embark on another project.

As he put it, "I want to let this experience sink in and see what happens."

At home in Knightsbridge

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

KNIGHTSBRIDGE, London — "Is that it, love?" My cab driver, one of the famously knowledgeable London Black Taxi drivers, still isn't sure he's found the right place.

This Knightsbridge hotel blends in so perfectly with its Victorian neighbours that the minuscule sign is hardly noticeable.

Fifty-seven Pont Street is both the address and the name of the hotel – very discreet, as befits Knightsbridge. I love staying here, in the heart of London, a stone's throw from elegant department stores Harvey Nichols ("Harvey Nicks" to locals) and Harrod's.

In one direction, Pont Street leads to Sloane Street, where the fashionistas called "Sloane Rangers" pursue their retail therapy. In the other direction, you'll discover tucked-away Beauchamp Place, a sublime few blocks of high-end boutiques and restaurants, blithely mispronounced "Beecham Place" by the English.

The hotel is small and homey, with a brand-new main floor bar, and a basement lounge that is used as a breakfast room and a bar.

Comfort comes first in the 22 bedrooms: smooth Egyptian cottons on firm beds, thin plasma TV screens, easy Internet connections, Avedo products in the compact bathrooms. Soaring ceilings that date from the hotel's original life as an elegant private home are lit by Italian chandeliers. Swaths of silky fabric frame entrances to hall doorways and to the lift, whose ceilings show fluffy clouds painted on a blue sky.

Along with a generous breakfast, room service delivers eat-in meals, latté or tea, with the world's best snacks: buttery shortbread, coconut and ginger biscuits.

Adjacent South Kensington first became desirable when 17th-century Dutch imports William of Orange and Mary II moved into Kensington Palace, commissioning Christopher Wren to redesign the mansion known as Nottingham House into a royal dwelling. Interestingly, it was the most popular royal of recent times, Princess Diana, who would later live in Kensington Palace, where thousands of grieving mourners came to leave notes and bouquets after her death. Diana is memorialized by a new children's playground in nearby Kensington Gardens.

Yet a stroll around the neighbourhood reveals that you don't have to be royal to live here. Little boys, albeit well-born ones, shout and play ball at dusk in gated private gardens accessible to those who live in the leafy squares. The nearby Brompton Oratory is renowned for its boys' school, where Prime Minister Tony Blair sent his kids.

The heart of London design beats a few blocks away from Pont Street, on Cromwell Road, at the Victoria and Albert Museum. All seven miles of the the V&A's 145 galleries are free. Devoted to British design and decorative treasures, among V&A's crowdpleasers is the 1590 Great Bed of Ware, so famous in its own time that Shakespeare mentions it in Twelfth Night. Recently, the museum has been home to a number of retro exhibits: last fall was "Radical Fashion," featuring such British designers as Alexander McQueen and Vivian Westwood, and this summer was Art Deco (now on tour at Toronto's Royal Ontario Museum).

The museum's current blockbuster design exhibit, which runs until May 2, 2004, showcases 1960s designer Ossie Clarke, who epitomized Swinging London. Singer Marianne Faithful did the honours at the show's mid-July opening. Painter David Hockney, a friend of the designer, painted him and his then-wife Celia Birtwell in a portrait that ranks with the finest in modern portraiture. Everyone has an Ossie story, and the V&A's website is collecting memories of his designs from the women who wore them – along with their regrets. "How I wish I'd kept that gorgeous dress," one wrote.

Over a weekend, I joined the "Hidden Knightsbridge" walking tour run by LondonWalks, where I gleaned some fascinating facts from our guide.

Inspired by the success of the 1855 Great Exhibition, an event Queen Victoria attended 40 times, her consort Prince Albert used the profits to build the new museums that are still popular today.

At the top of Exhibition Road, you'll see the gloriously rotund Royal Albert Hall, named in her husband's honour by Victoria, and home to both the Proms series of classical concerts and rockin' good evenings such as the Paul McCartney concert held last spring. Next comes the Natural History and Science Museum, and finally, on the corner, the V&A.

The lights of Knightsbridge are definitely aglow these days-and not only at Harrod's, which sails out into its corner like a ocean liner bedecked in tiny lights. This is the place to fantasize about living the good life, if only for a weekend.

After "just looking" at the Giorgio Armani Emporium, I drop into inexpensive Uniqlo, a chic and cheerful Japanese clothing chain. The first time I stayed at 57 Pont Street, I saw Helen Worth, the actress who plays Gail on Coronation Street, Britain's longest-running soap opera, turning into Beauchamp Place just ahead of me. Since then, Gail's soap life has not improved – she married the nefarious Richard, a serial murderer, who quickly became England's most popular modern villain.

This time I didn't see her – she's probably recovering at a sanatorium somewhere – but I got to stroll around my favourite neighbourhood, peeking into its nooks and crannies. Mick Jagger has a town house here. So do I, when I'm in London.

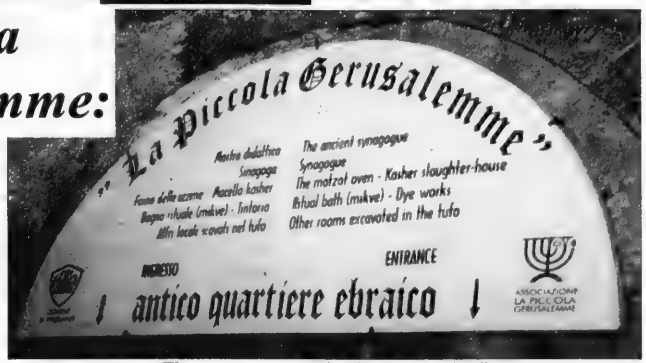
La Piccola Gerusalemme:

The Little Jerusalem from Tuscany



The entrance gate to the "Little Jerusalem"

By MYRIAM SHECHTER
Special to The CJN

PITIGLIANO, Italy — Every Tuscan town in this blessed sun-drenched region of Italy has its claim to fame, be it art, history, wine or cheese. In the southern reaches of Tuscany, in the Maremma area, the town of Pitigliano has its own particular brand of fame. A strikingly picturesque medieval town, Pitigliano was the site of an increasingly flourishing Jewish community, beginning with the arrival during the 16th century of a few Jewish families on the run from the papal states, whose borders were just five kilometres away.

Built on a stark volcanic tuffa (diver) hill surrounded by vineyards, Pitigliano has kept its medieval character while delighting its visitors with fine Renaissance buildings and charming vicoli, little alleys opening from the main streets.

We entered the old town through a beautiful arched gate connecting two spacious piazzas. After a short walk, we reached Via Zuccarelli. Steep dark side alleys offered bright views of the surrounding countryside with the imposing arches of the old Roman aqueduct and the peaceful Jewish cemetery built just outside the town's old walls.

In fact, Via Zuccarelli cuts through the site of the medieval Jewish ghetto. It was here, during the 16th century, that the Jewish community swelled so much Pitigliano became known as Little Jerusalem, La Piccola Gerusalemme.

By the 17th century, the community had a synagogue, a school and a cemetery, but like all Jews in Tuscany, those in Pitigliano has to wear distinguishing marks: a red cap for men, a red badge on the sleeve for women.

Toward the end of the 18th century, 2500 people lived in Pitigliano, and 200 of those were Jews who ran most of the shops in town. In spite of some unfortunate anti-Semitic incidents, the population continued to grow and prosper and complete legal equality was achieved in 1859. Eventually, the community started to shrink, as its members moved to larger cities. By World War II, only about five to six families remained in Pitigliano. Protected by local people, all survived the war.

Today, there are only three Jewish people left in town. One of them, a gracious lady named Elena Servi – a descendant of many generations of Pitigliano Jews – was our host in a Jewish centre complex that houses a reconstructed synagogue destroyed during the war, as well as a medieval mikvah, a kosher butchery, a wine cellar, a matzah bakery and a museum.

Quite surprised to find such a tribute to local Jewish history in a town with hardly any Jews, I asked Elena to tell me about it.

Apparently, the municipality of Pitigliano considered the town's Jewish history an integral part of its overall history and, in order to preserve its heritage, they invested in a 10-year project to rebuild the synagogue from scratch relying on old photographs, and to create this memorial within the area of the old Jewish ghetto.

We entered the "Little Jerusalem" under a stone arch over which a large plaque read: "La Piccola Gerusalemme – antico quartiere ebraico" (old Jewish quarter). After purchasing our entrance tickets – 2.50 euros, 1.50 euros for seniors – we started our visit through a series of chambers built into the volcanic tuffa rock.

In the mikvah, we could still see the remains of the basin used for the ritual bathing. The room next to it used to house the wine cellar where the kosher wine was made (a variety of kosher wines are still produced in Pitigliano under the supervision of a rabbi).

We visited the old kosher butchery, the bakery that was used once a year to bake matzah for Passover, and a workshop for cloth dyeing. Still visible near its entrance was the slot for a long-gone mezuzah. The room that housed the first school and synagogue in 1598 is now a little museum exhibiting old prayer books and various ornamental religious objects.

Finally, we joined Claudia, an English speaking guide, and a few other visitors and proceeded toward the synagogue. Partially collapsed in 1963, the synagogue was restored in 1995 in a blend of Renaissance and Baroque styles.

Dark wood benches and a central tevah (reader's platform) glowed warmly under ornamental candelabra. The wall with the women's gallery, protected by a gilded wood balustrade, is the only original surviving part from the old synagogue. Plaques marking visits by famous dignitaries surround a central ornamented inscription in Hebrew: "If I forget thee Jerusalem, let my right hand be forgotten."

In a creative way, the Pitiglianese had not forgotten their Jews. Here, one can still buy billo, a ham made of turkey rather than pork, an old Jewish culinary tradition.

We left Pitigliano munching on sfratto, a walnut and honey delicacy, a local Jewish dessert. The town is a sweet reminder of Jewish lives not marred by pogroms and the Holocaust, a rarity in the turbulent history of European Jewry.

New book claims Ford company was complicit with Nazis

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

A new book by Montreal investigative journalist Max Wallace provides compelling evidence that the Ford Motor Company retained considerable control of its German subsidiary during World War II, even after Pearl Harbor, and willingly used slave labour that enabled it to realize a profit during the war years.

The American Axis: Henry Ford, Charles Lindbergh and the Rise of the Third Reich, published by St. Martin's Press of New York, is a chilling indictment of a company that has in recent years attempted to, to use Wallace's word, sanitize both its wartime record and the vicious anti-Semitism of its founder, Henry Ford.

The title refers to the book's main theme. Ford and the aviator Lindbergh, two of the greatest American heroes, were Nazi sympathizers who used their influence and, in the case of Ford, wealth, to prevent Britain from defending itself against Germany and to keep the United States out of the war. Wallace shows that the Nazis secretly plotted to install Lindbergh as the leader of the isolationist movement, regarding him as one of their best propaganda assets.

The two were friends from the time they first met in 1927.

Despite Ford's public abandonment of his anti-Semitic campaign in the 1920s and attempts to make amends to the Jewish community, Wallace has unearthed ample material showing that Ford never changed his stripes. Ford's longtime secretary and confidante German-American Ernest Liebold was a Nazi spy and may have masterminded Ford's anti-Semitic campaign and possible financing of Adolf Hitler's rise to power, Wallace demonstrates.

Lindbergh also held strong prejudices against Jews and agreed with the Nazi mythology and eugenics' promise of racial improvement, views he never completely renounced.

Wallace draws upon thousands of pages of prime sources, much of it previously classified, such as FBI and U.S. military and naval intelligence files obtained through freedom of information requests, as well as a wealth of personal papers, including correspondence between Ford and Lindbergh.

In rebutting the Ford company's recent claims that it had no control over and no communication with Ford-Werke during the war and bears no responsibility for its use of slave labour, Wallace has combed through newly declassified documents from the U.S. National Archives and the Berlin Bundesarchiv. Wallace makes the case that the parent company was complicit in the use (and abuse) of thousands of forced labourers at its German subsidiary in Cologne, some of them children as young as 14 rounded up in occupied territory.

Moreover, the company was massively contributing to the German war machine, apparently with the consent of Henry Ford, who had vowed to never aid a "foreign belligerent," his excuse for refusing to manufacture Rolls-Royce engines for Britain in 1940.

"While most other German-based American companies had been seized by the Nazis as 'enemy property' after Pearl Harbor [in December 1941], the Ford-Werke plant continued operating for months as if nothing had changed," Wallace writes.

"This wasn't mere happenstance, but the result of concerted efforts on the part of its senior executives to protect Dearborn's [Ford's Michigan headquarters] financial interests."

Wallace also points out that Hitler admired Henry Ford, and the Nazis made good use of Ford's book The International Jew to stir up anti-Semitism before the war.

After May 1942, Ford-Werke was placed under trusteeship but retained the same manager, and all profits and dividends were placed in an escrow account for distribution to the American parent company after the war, Wallace found.

"Ford-Werke consistently received permission from German government authorities to run its own affairs, with minimal interference from the Nazi regime."

Ford-Werke produced army vehicles and some specialized munitions. With the increasing manpower shortage, Ford-Werke began using slave labourers, the first coming from the nearby Buchenwald concentration camp.

"Contrary to common myth, the company was not compelled to employ slave labourers or concentration camp inmates, nor were they automatically assigned these workers by the regime. Rather, Ford had to 'purchase' the workers or fill out an application with Nazi authorities, detailing the company's needs," Wallace writes.

Charles Krauch, the chair of IG Farben, the German chemical giant most closely linked to the Holocaust, was also deputy chair of Ford-Werke. He was tried at Nuremberg for war crimes.

Interestingly, Wallace found that documents released by the Ford company in December 2001 following an internal investigation into its wartime business dealings with the Nazi regime, are self-incriminating. Perhaps the company had hoped no one would plow through the 98,000 pages accompanying a 198-page report.

That report comes to no conclusions, saying it leaves that up to readers. Yet, at the press conference where it was released, Ford chief of staff John Rintamaki reiterated that the company had no choice but to use labour provided by the German government.

Wallace, the first independent researcher to access those 98,000 pages, found that the claim is not supported. He discovered that the first forced labourers arrived at the plant before the United States entered the war, as early as September 1940. He found no evidence that Ford was forced to use slave labour or that the Nazis were responsible for their brutal treatment.

The documentation also appears to refute Ford's contention that it did not profit from its German subsidiary during the war. Wallace found PricewaterhouseCoopers accounting firm records show the company realized a net operating profit of well over $1 million US during the war years. In addition, there was $600,000 in dividends in escrow after the war and the total value of Ford-Werke increased by 14 per cent during the war.

Wallace reports that the company has refused to comment directly on the revelation that its former president may have been guilty of trading with the enemy.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Foundation offering $2,500 university scholarships

The Diabetes Hope Foundation is offering university scholarships with a twist. What makes these $2,500 awards unique is that they are not only related to marks and extracurricular activities, but are contingent on applicants maintaining their health during the preceding year.

Barbara Pasternak

"It's a wonderful tool," said Barbara Pasternak, founder and chair of the foundation (www.diabeteshopefoundation.com) and the mother of three sons, two of whom are university students who have Type 1 diabetes (formerly called juvenile-onset diabetes), which, like Type 2 diabetes (formerly called adult-onset diabetes), prevents the production or proper use of insulin, a hormone needed for the body to process sugar.

Scholarship applicants must be turning 18, said Pasternak, because after that, patients are not accepted in the pediatric health care system. In Ontario, pediatric clinics begin to prepare young diabetics for the transition to adult care a year ahead of time, but more than 40 per cent of young people with diabetes don't return to the health care system at all. Of those, she said, approximately half return five years later with complications such as kidney and eye problems.

Pasternak began the scholarships four years ago as an added incentive and has awarded 62 of them. This year, she hopes to award 30 more.

Leaving home for the first time to go away to university can be traumatic for kids with diabetes, said Pasternak.

"They have to be very vigilant in their diet, exercise, insulin and health care."

About 10 per cent of the scholarship recipients had already begun to neglect their health in high school but decided to "come back into the fold" and apply for the awards, she said. On the application form, students must include three blood sugar levels from the previous year, as tested in hospital. The deadline for scholarship application for the coming year is the end of March.

Pasternak, a teacher by training who now operates a business with her husband, had no experience with diabetes or fundraising when her son Bobby, now 19, was diagnosed eight years ago. Jesse, now 20, was diagnosed a year later.

Although Bobby's symptoms are obvious to Pasternak in retrospect, at the time she figured that the young competitive hockey player was sweaty, tired and thirsty so often because of his intensive sports involvement.

It was only after he fainted in her arms following a game that he was diagnosed. But an initial hospitalization didn't mean the end of his hockey career. His doctor gave him a day pass, warning that Bobby might not play well.

"Exercise is so important," said Pasternak.

"As a mother, I felt it was necessary for me to make a difference – to make sense of what was going on, and how I could keep them healthy," Pasternak said. "I decided I wanted to make a difference for not only my children, but for others."

Although she knew of organizations that funded diabetes research – such as the Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation – Pasternak said she found gaps in terms of addressing day-to-day care issues and awareness.

Last year, she established a Medical Assistance Program to provide funding for diabetic youngsters whose families can't afford the insulin they need to stay healthy. For patients who need three or four injections a day, insulin can run $200 to $250 a month, said Pasternak, who runs the foundation with one assistant. An insulin pump, which is not covered by Ontario's health insurance plan, costs approximately $5,500. The device "mimics the actual pancreas in that it slowly infuses insulin into the system all the time," she explained.

The Diabetes Hope Foundation also provides funding for Camp Huronda, a non-profit summer camp for children with diabetes.

As well, Pasternak runs an annual golf tournament to raise money for the foundation. Last year's raised $140,000.

Protein level linked to heart attack recovery: Israeli study

By YUVAL DROR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Limited

There is a direct correlation between the level of a protein called CRP in a patient's blood and the chances of recovering from a heart attack caused by a blocked coronary artery, according to a new study by researchers from the Technion and Rambam Medical Center.

The researchers found that of patients with a high level of CRP (C-Reactive Protein), 22 per cent died within 30 days of suffering a heart attack. This is almost eight times higher than the mortality rate among patients with a low CRP level.

"In modern cardiology, we are searching for markers that can help us understand the patient's situation. This protein serves as a clear and unequivocal marker," said Prof. Haim Hammerman of Technion's faculty of medicine, who headed the research team, in explaining the finding's importance.

The results of the study were published last month in the American Journal of Medicine.

CRP has recently been the focus of numerous studies, as there appears to be a correlation between a person's CRP level and the likelihood of suffering heart problems.

"Some have even compared it to 'bad cholesterol' with regard to the information it gives a person about his situation," Hammerman said.

The protein is generally released because of an inflammation. However, noted Hammerman, the presence of the protein "doesn't tell us where in the body there is an inflammation. It is nonspecific. All it tells us is that there is an inflammation somewhere."

In recent years, researchers have discovered that blocked coronary arteries often cause inflammation of the heart. Therefore, Hammerman's team decided to investigate whether it also resulted in high CRP levels, and whether this had any implications for a patient's recovery rate.

They examined 448 patients who suffered heart attacks due to a blocked coronary artery by taking blood from them within 12 to 24 hours after the attack occurred and testing it for CRP. The patients were divided into three categories: those with a low CRP level (less than 6.9 milligrams per litre of blood), those with a medium level (6.9 to 22.3 milligrams per litre) and those with a high level (more than 22.3 milligrams per litre). The researchers then followed the patients' progress for 30 days.

At the end of 30 days, only 3 per cent (4 patients) of those with a low CRP level had died, compared to 10 per cent (15 patients) of those with a medium level and 22 per cent (33 patients) of those with a high level.

Furthermore, only 8 per cent of those with a low CRP level suffered from insufficient blood flow through the heart – considered a serious complication – after the attack, compared to 44 per cent of those with a high CRP level.

The strength of the results has led the researchers to wonder whether CRP is merely an indicator or whether it also plays an active role in impeding a patient's recovery. However, Hammerman said, there is not yet enough information to answer this question.

Yet even without this information, he stressed, the clear correlation between CRP level and risk level could provide doctors with an important additional tool for deciding on treatment.

"If we know that a certain patient has a high protein level, we might choose a more aggressive treatment than we would have chosen had we not had this information," he explained. "But this matter requires further research."

Hammerman added that the test for CRP level is neither expensive nor complicated, and could therefore easily be made standard procedure for all heart attack patients.

Thornhill teen a late cut from national junior squad

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Nothing against the family, but Adam Henrich was rather disappointed to be home for the holidays.

The 19-year-old Thornhill native had hoped to be spending Chanukah and the first few days of 2004 over in Finland as a member of Canada's World Junior hockey team.

But it was not to be, as the fourth-year winger with the Brampton Battalion of the Ontario Hockey League received an early Monday-morning phone call on Dec. 15 telling him that he had been released from the club.

"I was really disappointed," said Henrich, who was one of the final additions to the 34-man roster that was invited to the team's selection camp in Kitchener, Ont.

"I did what I thought I was supposed to, what people said I should be doing to make the team. I played the power forward role, won the one-on-one battles, scored, set up plays.

"It would be different if I didn't think I had a shot. I thought I should have been there."

Henrich had a goal and an assist in three games, two inter-squad and an exhibition contest against the Ontario university all-stars.

While he was a member of the OHL's squad in the recent Canada-Russia Challenge Series, the Tampa Bay Lightning prospect did not get an invitation to Canada's National Junior Team development camp, held last August in Calgary, which may have hindered his chances of making the final cut.

"He really deserved to be at the selection camp. Unfortunately, we have some good talent and a lot of depth at his position, it was tough for Adam to make that team."

Henrich's older brother Michael, now with the AHL's Toronto Roadrunners, attended two national junior camps when he played in Barrie, but failed to crack the roster on either occasion.

The 6-4, 214-pound Henrich had hoped for an opportunity to go overseas and build on the international experience he gained as a member of Canada's team at the World Under-18 Championship in Slovakia in April 2002.

But just being at the selection camp was something special, he said.

"It was a great experience playing with all-stars from the top [junior] hockey league in the world," he said.

"Even just throwing on that Canadian jersey during those exhibition games and seeing how good everyone is out there and what you've got to do to make it to the next level because most of those guys will be in the NHL one day."

Henrich hopes to get there too and posted some impressive numbers with Brampton over the first half of the season, building his case for a contract offer. He sat second in team scoring through the holiday break with 32 points (13 goals and 19 assists) in 31 games.

Henrich has until June 1 to sign with the Lightning, otherwise the club's 2002 second-round pick will re-enter the pro draft.

"It seems they're really high on me, but you never know," said Henrich, who keeps in regular contact with Tampa's head scout.

"I've got to go out there and play hockey, let my agent deal with the signing. I have no clue right now, you can't worry about that kind of stuff."

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

While other 10-year-old boys are playing Nintendo or getting into mischief, Tommy Reznikov is busy in the gym, perfecting the taekwondo skills that have earned him a second-degree black belt and two championship titles.

Reznikov captured his first Canadian Junior National Taekwondo Championship in Vancouver in 2002 as a bantamweight, followed by a second as a welterweight last June in Winnipeg.

Reznikov has been involved with taekwondo since the age of five.

"My dad said I needed to get fit," said the Grade 5 student, who began his training at Jun Ko Taekwondo before moving to Chu's Martial Arts.

"The teacher made it fun, and I've gotten twice as strong since I first began."

With a full schedule, including a recent provincial tournament in Niagara Falls and the Canadian Nationals in March, Reznikov follows an intense four-day-a-week training program.

"I'm sparring right now," he said of his training, which includes private classes three times a week and adult classes on the weekends.

"I practise my speed, technique, and do lots of pushups and sit-ups at home," said Reznikov, a die-hard fan of martial arts film stars Jackie Chan, Bruce Lee and Jet Li.

As well as holding the two championship titles, Reznikov has won a number of local tournaments. Last winter, he captured the title at the Battle of Columbus in Ohio.

Competitive fights go either two or three rounds, and scoring is straightforward. A fighter who delivers a knockdown gets two points. Three points are awarded for a standing eight-count.

He has a variety of manoeuvres in his repertoire, including front snap kicks, round-house and back kicks.

"Going to the head is my favorite thing to do, because you get rewarded two or three points," he said.

"In tournaments I feel stronger than in class, and I will always go for the head."

Due to his work ethic and determination, Reznikov was recently named his club's black belt of the year.

"Every person wants a black belt in martial arts," said Reznikov, who had to perform patterns and some board-breaking to win.

"A lot of people quit when they get a black belt, but I care most of all about the training.

"I like to train really hard after a loss," he said.

The little community that could

As a participant in AVODAH, a Jewish service corps program that combines anti-poverty and community work with Jewish study, I am living for a year in Brooklyn, N.Y., with nine other people while working at a non-profit organization. My housemates and I recently had a major meeting about food sharing, finances and how we feel about the pressing issues facing our international community. The meeting was difficult, emotional and stretched long into the night as each of us voiced our thoughts about the ways we've been purchasing food and supplies, cooking meals and functioning as a community.

By ELISHEVA GOULD

Thus far, because of our vastly different food preferences, levels of kashrut and dietary and health requirements, the 10 of us have been buying food in smaller subgroups that better accommodate our individual needs. However, most of us agree that this approach – though easy and comfortable – is uneconomical and divisive. We've split down the middle, with five of us using the kosher kitchen regularly, and the rest of us using the not-so-kosher fridge and stove on a different floor of the house.

Although our varying work schedules add to our difficulties in cooking and eating meals together, our current two-kitchen division clinches our inability to come together as one group at mealtimes. This has taken its toll on our sense of community, because it considerably limits our contact with – and, subsequently, our closeness to – half of our housemates.

Many things were whirling through our minds during our meeting: cost-effectiveness, divisiveness, wanting to change something in order to foster our communal life, needing to stretch ourselves beyond what is familiar and safe, being more environmentally and socially conscious, and our personal and communal goals.

Ultimately, the greater majority of us voted to keep the status quo – to maintain our food shopping subgroups – but also to make substantial changes that will help us feel like and become more of a unit. We decided to have at least one communal meal each week. How would we implement this? We each put $10 a month into our communal money pot (in addition to our $5 a month for toilet paper, light bulbs and cleaning supplies) and committed to shopping for and cooking one weekly meal with a fellow housemate once every two months. We also committed to being home for that weekly meal to enjoy our housemates' culinary efforts, as well as to help with the dishes and check in with one another on house issues and everyone's day.

After more than a handful of communal meals, I'm proud to report that we have all been conscious of each other's food preferences and needs, and we are beginning to feel the positive effects that such regular group time is having on our home. I am more aware of how my housemates are feeling about their daily experiences in New York, their family lives and their jobs. Wow – a successful result from a difficult house meeting!

It is a great challenge to try to live with people other than our families. Unless you have been raised on a kibbutz, it is not natural to think about the needs of 10 or more people, nor to consider those needs each time you shop, cook, plan to go out or even just decide to go to sleep early one night! But our AVODAH community gives us the unique opportunity to grow individually and to learn from each other as we live together and dedicate our days to doing social justice work.

Next time, I will share with you the intense experiences I am having while working nine to five (and then some!) at a non-profit organization.

Strawberry Stuffed French Toast

1/2 tsp. lemon juice
1/2 tsp. lemon zest
4 tbsp. sugar
4 - 1" thick slices of French bread
1 cup milk
2 tsp. vanilla extract
1/4 tsp. baking powder
4 egg whites
2 eggs
3 tsp. butter
fresh strawberries
preheat oven to 400°F

Mix together 1 cup of strawberries, lemon juice, zest and 2 tbsp. sugar. Set aside. Cut bread slices in half and cut a slit in each slice to form a pocket. Stuff with strawberries, secure with toothpicks. Place slices in a 13" x 9" greased baking dish. In a saucepan, combine milk, sugar, vanilla, baking powder and eggs. Mix well. Pour over stuffed bread, turning to coat. Chill 30-60 min., turning bread pieces occasionally.

Grease another 13" x 9" baking pan. Move bread pieces to this second pan and bake for 3-6 minutes on each side. Serve warm with syrup and additional strawberries. Serves 4.

Statistics from the 2001 census herald both good news and bad news. In the Toronto area, there are now some 179,000 Jews, a marked increase over 1991's 163,000 and 1981's 129,000. The increase comes at a time when other diaspora communities are shrinking because of low birthrates and assimilation. While our low birthrates and high levels of indifference are not cause for optimism, Toronto has absorbed significant numbers of Jews from other cities in Canada, from the former Soviet Union and from Israel.

But numbers have not been our great strength in the many years of our existence as a people. One gets the impression from the census figures in the Bible that we were once impressed by our size (or that we hoped others would be), but ever since our first exile to Babylon, our stress has been on quality.

While a quick look at our community also speaks to the high quality of our schools, synagogues, federation, welfare agencies and cultural organizations, a closer look at the gap between the overall numbers and the active Jews in the GTA reveals areas of concern.

From the world of Jewish schooling, for instance, we know there are 35,235 children aged 14 and under, but there are only 14,223 kids in that age range in Jewish schools, including pre-schools, elementary day schools and supplementary schools. Even if we factor out babies and those in the first year of high school, there are still less than 50 per cent of our children in Jewish schools at any one time. That hardly seems like a Toronto statistic. While some of the uncounted children may have received a few years of supplementary schooling, others have received nothing at all.

We also know that there are approximately 15,000 teens in our community, but if you add up all the day high school and yeshiva students, as well as teens in youth groups, Jewish camps (from maximum exposure to minimal content) and the few who attend supplementary high school programs, the total will not exceed 4,000.

Where are those 11,000 untouched Jewish youth and what kind of responsible Jewish adults will they become with minimal Jewish knowledge?

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

Message from the President

2003 was an eventful year in every sense. It was a year in which we faced and overcame many challenges. It was also a year in which we had much to celebrate, especially the impact we have on people's lives. Throughout it all, the Mount Sinai Hospital family continued to exemplify healthcare and teamwork at its finest.

Starting the year on a positive and well deserved note, the Hospital received full accreditation from the Canadian Council on Health Services Accreditation. In September, we officially opened the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Building and the innovative health centres located there: the Murray Koffler Urologic Wellness Centre, the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes, the Prosserman Centre for Health Research, and the Rebecca McDonald Centre for Arthritis and Autoimmune Disease.

With the incorporation of the University of Toronto's, Faculty of Dentistry – Oral and Maxillofacial Surgery Program into our Hospital's Department of Dentistry, we now have one of the largest, most comprehensive hospital-based academic dental programs in North America. These centres, as well as other program enhancements, are part of our strategy to provide world-class healthcare.

We are committed to providing you with The Best Medicine by moving forward with dedication, enthusiasm, and purpose.

Lawrence S. Bloomberg, Chair of the Board of Directors and I take great pleasure, on behalf of the Sinai family, to wish you and your families a happy, healthy, and prosperous New Year.

Canada urged to take lead against suicide bombings

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Simon Wiesenthal Center is urging Canada to spearhead an international effort to have suicide bombings considered a crime against humanity.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based SWC, met in Ottawa last week with Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, Opposition foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day and members of the Bloc Québécois in a bid to lay the groundwork for Canadian involvement in the project.

Rabbi Cooper also visited SWC supporters in Montreal and Toronto before heading to Belgium and Turkey. He planned to hold a press conference in Brussels with Ilka Shroeder, a 27-year-old Green party member of the European Parliament who supports the proposal. Later, he was to meet the Turkish foreign minister in Ankara to discuss whether Turkey would become the first Muslim state to take up the issue.

Kosher beef safe, industry says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Kosher consumers in Toronto and Montreal should have no concerns about buying and eating beef, despite the latest mad cow scare involving a cow in the United States that originated in Alberta, industry representatives say.

Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council of Canada, said a combination of safeguards – ranging from traditional kosher slaughtering practices to beef-purchasing policies – make kosher beef safer.

Mad cow concerns

"We cannot be 100 per cent guaranteed, but mad cow has never yet been found in a kosher-slaughtered animal," Rabbi Levin said.

Mark Brookman, who is responsible for customer service relations at Levitts Kosher Foods Inc., which describes itself as the largest processor of glatt kosher meat in Canada, said all kosher meat on the market in Montreal comes from "the central area of Canada" and not Alberta.

Yakov Luss, president of Shefa Meats in Toronto, a kosher meat producer and wholesaler, said his company only buys Ontario meat, and in any event, a shochet, or ritual slaughterer, makes sure a cow is free of any health problems.

Quake Relief Fund

TORONTO — Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian Relief Committee has established a crisis relief fund to assist victims of last month's earthquake in Iran. For details, visit www.veahavta.org, or to donate, call 1-877-582-5472.

Passion Coming Soon

TORONTO — The Passion of Christ, a film directed by Mel Gibson, is being released in Canada Feb. 25, Ash Wednesday, by Montreal-based Equinoxe Films as part of its wider North American release. The film, which depicts the last 12 hours of Jesus' life, has been criticized as anti-Semitic by some Christian scholars and Jewish groups based on leaked early copies of its script. They fear it will revive old charges of Jewish guilt in Jesus' death. Gibson will preview the film for 3,000 Christian pastors from 80 denominations and 40 countries, including Canada and the United States, Jan. 21 at a conference in Orlando, Fla.

Bronfman Fellowships

ALBANY, N.Y. — The Samuel Bronfman Foundation is seeking applicants for its annual Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel. They offer 26 North American students entering Grade 12 in fall 2004 the chance to spend five weeks in Israel next summer. Fellows will be chosen based on character, intellectual interests, talents and leadership qualities. For applications, visit www.bronfman.org, or call 518-475-7212. Deadline is Jan. 30.

Matching Grant?

NEW YORK — The newly formed Center for Cultural Judaism said last month it would be the first to match billionaire U.S. philanthropist and Birthright Israel co-founder Michael Steinhardt's start-up pledge of $10 million (US) toward the goal of a $100 million fund for Jewish education. The centre said the pledge, made possible by a grant from the Swiss-based Posen Foundation, is contingent on about half the total money going to teaching secular and unaffiliated Jews about Judaism from a cultural, non-religious viewpoint. Steinhardt told JTA he wanted to study the proposal further before commenting.

Muslim Event Hosts Speaker With Neo-Nazi Ties

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress has criticized the organizers of an Islamic conference titled "Reviving the Islamic Spirit" for including a California speaker with ties to known U.S. neo-Nazi groups.

William W. Baker, the founder of the group Christians and Muslims for Peace and author of Theft of a Nation, a book about the Palestinians, was to have dealt with common ground between Christians and Muslims in his Jan. 3 talk at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre. Instead, he criticized Israel for its treatment of the Palestinians and urged the audience to "stand up and demonstrate for the Palestinian people." He received loud applause, the Toronto Star reported.

"When a group brings in someone like William Baker, some serious questions have to be asked," Bernie Farber, executive director of CJC's Ontario region, told the Star.

Conference media relations director Jeewan Chanicka responded that organizers did not knowingly invite someone with alleged links to U.S. racist groups.

Promotional material for the three-day event – attended by some 3,500 Muslims – said it aimed "to promote stronger ties within the Muslim community through reviving the Islamic tradition of education, tolerance and introspection."

Arson Arrest

TERRE HAUTE, Ind. — Investigators are analyzing evidence that could link an abortion-clinic arsonist to a fire at a Holocaust museum in Indiana. Police arrested Joseph Charles Stockett, 57, last month after an informant told police Stockett was involved in the November attack on the CANDLES Holocaust Museum in Terre Haute and was planning to kill Jews. Stockett, who in 1976 was convicted of burning down a Planned Parenthood office in Oregon and has been diagnosed with schizophrenia, was being held on an unrelated firearms charge. The museum's founder, Auschwitz survivor Eva Mozes Kor, said she has collected $80,000 (US) in donations to rebuild the museum, which she said will cost $250,000.

Pardons for Smugglers

BERN — Nearly 60 years on, Switzerland has pardoned citizens who were jailed or fined for illegally smuggling Jews to safety in the neutral nation during World War II. Some 25,000 Jews found shelter in Switzerland from 1938 to 1945, but thousands more were turned away at the border.

Students Expelled

PARIS — Two Grade 6 students of Muslim North African Arab origin have been expelled from a prestigious Paris school for abusing an 11-year-old Jewish student. The Lycée Montaigne expelled the boys after complaints by parents associations and the Jewish boy's parents that the school failed to deal with the matter since the start of the school year.

U of T Student Wins Inaugural Birthright Prize

TORONTO — University of Toronto art history major Johanna Herman has been named one of six winners of a new Birthright Israel award.

Herman, a 22-year-old Toronto native, is the only Canadian to win an inaugural Charlie Award for young adults who have returned from a free Birthright Israel trip and made a contribution to their local Jewish communities. The awards were established by philanthropist and Birthright funder Lynne Schusterman in memory of her husband Charles, a businessman from Tulsa, Okla., who helped found Birthright.

Herman, who went on one of the Birthright's 10-day trips for adults aged 18 to 26 in May 2002, said the experience "awakened a deep sense of purpose in me."

Since her return, she has become active in Hillel at U of T, most recently as its public relations co-ordinator, and she has been working with the university's administration and the campus community at large to promote Israel and highlight the dangers of anti-Semitism.

The other winners hail from the United States, Russia and Argentina. Earlier this month in Jerusalem, each received $1,800 (US) to donate evenly between two charitable projects, one in Israel and one locally, and each received a shofar, symbolizing a call to action for Israel.

York U suspends student council funding

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Student election vote overturned

Battle-weariness appears to be setting in as the York University student government election saga continues.

Last week when students returned to classes, the York Federation of Students (YFS) faced a Friday deadline to finally resolve the complicated situation. York vice-president and provost Bonnie Neuman had written to YFS president Mike Novak on Dec. 18 warning that she would assume financial trusteeship of the federation if things were not resolved.

YFS funding was suspended last Friday – meaning the administration will not advance the council any more of the money it collects from student levies– and a York staff member was appointed to monitor the group's finances. However, Novak said he believes YFS has enough funds available to continue "in the short term."

Although the Progress Not Politics (PNP) slate, headed by fourth-year student Paul Cooper, won 27 of 32 seats in the late-November election, results of the vote have not yet been ratified.

Cooper, who heads the campus group the Young Zionist Partnership, said he and his slate wanted to reorient YFS' focus toward student issues such as parking, security and tuition. Hillel backed the slate, with president Jordie Saperia saying YFS had become increasingly involved in anti-Israel activities.

Usually a formality, ratification was initially delayed by a YFS elections committee hearing on Dec. 4 to determine whether Cooper's campaign literature expenses violated campaign spending regulations. The complaints were dismissed by a 3-0 vote, with one abstention.

But at a Dec. 15 meeting of the outgoing YFS council, a motion that would have ratified the election results was tabled because of allegations the committee member who abstained was intimidated into doing so.

None of the other three committee members who voted in Cooper's favour has claimed intimidation, Novak said. Nonetheless, the acquittal was overturned in a seven-hour YFS council meeting early last week, which went on until almost 1 a.m.

Of 26 votes, including proxies, two-thirds moved to overturn the verdict. A second hearing to re-examine the spending issue was to have taken place on Monday of this week.

"This is the epitome of undemocratic, pathetic, sour-grapes illegal politics," Cooper said last week.

"It's a renegade council that's gone against the wishes of all students of York and the principles of democracy that it's meant to uphold," he said, adding that "the administration has been supportive of doing what's right."

Novak, who has resigned from the elections committee, told The CJN last Friday he was "distraught" over the council's behaviour and its "undemocratic nature."

"The people on the PNP already went through a trial and they were acquitted," he said, stressing that he was stating his own views, not the position of the YFS.

"That should have been the end of it. They rightfully deserve to be in office."

Novak said he believes "some members of our council genuinely believe errors were made, but I do believe there is also another agenda," referring to tensions between the Hillel-endorsed slate and its pro-Palestinian opponents. In one incident during the campaign, a candidate was disqualified for slandering the PNP slate at a Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights event.

"You have two distinct slates: one pro-Israel, one pro-Arab," said Novak. "It so happens the pro-Israel slate won legitimately. It's very hard for the other side to accept. I believe that's the crux of the whole situation… It's gotten to the point where it is ridiculous. I think it's unacceptable that they're not in."

His dream, our benefit

From the editor's desk

Barely more than five years after he became director of the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO), Matthew Teitelbaum is shepherding Canada's second largest art museum (the National Art Gallery in Ottawa is larger) through a profound, community-altering transformation of structure and purpose.

On Jan. 28, Teitelbaum and his colleagues will unveil the much-anticipated designs of internationally celebrated architect Frank Gehry for the revitalization, renovation and remaking – ultimately, the transformation – of the historic, 104-year old art gallery in downtown Toronto.

Teitelbaum's aspirations for the project reach far beyond the transformation of the museum building. He aims to transform the experience itself of visiting the gallery. Gehry's designs are both the occasion and the means of achieving his aims.

In an interview with The CJN last week at his office, Teitelbaum talked of his hopes for the future and of some of the lessons from his past.

"This is a great privilege and opportunity to realize a dream – a dream to open the AGO to new experiences and new audiences," Teitelbaum said. "I'm thrilled to be working with one of the world's great architects. But my excitement is not just the excitement of new architecture, but also for the possibility of repositioning the AGO in the community and for the opportunity of changing the AGO's relationships with its many communities."

Teitelbaum is obviously focused on the long term. When asked to which communities he was referring, he described a multi-layered construct somewhat evocative of a many-chambered Russian doll. He had in mind the local, downtown community; the wider geographic affiliations to city, province and country; Canadian artists and art patrons; the internationally interconnected world of art and art museums; and perhaps the most meaningful of all communities for Teitelbaum, the visitors to the art gallery.

Leaning back in his chair, relaxed, collecting his thoughts carefully, Teitelbaum elaborated upon how the visitors' experiences are going to change.

"So much about a museum's activities are actually hidden from the public. Traditionally, people go into 'classical spaces' to look at art and then they leave. But there is a whole range of experiences out of view that the transformed AGO will bring into view."

He leaned forward across the desk, sipped again from his milky tea and continued, the excitement overtaking the relaxed calm.

"One of the things we want to do is unlock the mystery of how a museum truly operates. We want to celebrate with the visitor what a museum really is. We want to open the museum. The hidden activities at a museum – storage, conservation, research and education – will become part of the visitors' viewing experiences. Thus, the transformed museum will not only be about display and presentation but also about research and preservation.

Matthew Teitelbaum

"The museum will become an active, dynamic space. The new architecture will create new space and the new space will be for the new experiences we are creating. And," the young director said with transparent pride, his right hand touching the cover of a book about the architect with whom he has been collaborating these past many weeks, "this will be a true Frank Gehry space."

Teitelbaum said, "Our approach and motto will be: new art, new building, new ideas, new future.

"And don't forget," he added, "the transformation will take place within the context of an extraordinary change in the AGO's art collection itself."

The AGO is adding significantly to its collection by gifts of art from Kenneth Thomson, Murray Frum and an anonymous donor of more than 9,000 pre-World War II vintage prints of photographs.

In the simply-appointed modesty of his book-lined fourth floor office, Teitelbaum conveyed the understated gravitas of a corporate administrator and the bubbling eagerness of an art museum enthusiast. His enthusiasm for the AGO comes naturally to him. Born but three blocks from the museum, raised but three subway stops from the museum, he had his first formative experience about art there.

"The gallery made me think that a life in relation to the arts was possible."

How Teitelbaum has fashioned that possibility – much like a sculpture sculpting the raw materials of his ideas and hopes into form, shape and expressions of self – may soon transform the AGO visitor even as it transforms the gallery itself.

"Art should be stuff to dream by," Teitelbaum's late father, Mashel, a deeply talented artist, once told an interviewer. Twenty five years later, in words that hauntingly picked up the trail of his father's thought, the young director of the AGO reflected upon the path of his own life.

"When you're young, you have a dream. You follow a certain logic that has a high degree of commitment, a system of values rooted in ethical behaviour, married to intellectual curiosity and a desire to make a difference. If you believe in yourself, good things can happen."

Teitelbaum is on the verge of realizing a dream. And as a result, good things are about to happen for us all.

Wallenberg Day set for January 17

The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation, is inviting the community to commemorate Raoul Wallenberg Day Jan. 17, as designated by the government of Canada, at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

Wallenberg was a Swedish diplomat who for six months between 1944 and 1945, saved tens of thousands of Hungarian Jews from certain death. He vanished in January 1945 after the Red Army entered Budapest, and his fate remains unknown.

The program, called "Remembering a Lost Hero," will feature guest speaker Judy Feld Carr, who over 28 years, secretly arranged the rescue of 3,228 Syrian Jews.

For more information, call 416-635-2883, ext. 153, or www.jewishtoronto.net.

Ex-president reflects on UJA Federation career

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Lanky and quiet-spoken, Allan Reitzes is an unmistakable presence when he wears his signature bow tie.

Yet he has deliberately maintained a low profile in Toronto's Jewish community, despite having served for 11 years as UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's top professional staffer until recently.

"I was successful being in the background... I think it's an appropriate professional role," says Allan Reitzes, who stepped down Dec. 31.

In an interview last month before his resignation from the position took effect Dec. 31, the Richmond, Va., native, who has been replaced by new president Ted Sokolsky, said this was likely the first time in his 21 years with the federation – the umbrella for most Jewish organizations in the Toronto area – that he has been the subject of a newspaper article.

"That's my style," Reitzes said. "[Low-key.] More often I was successful being in the background. I still subscribe to that. It's worked well for me, and I think it's an appropriate professional role."

A social worker by training with a PhD from the University of Maryland, Reitzes said he modeled himself professionally after his late father, Stanley J. Reitzes, who was director of the Jewish Community Centre in Richmond, and spent four years in the same position in Cherry Hill, N.J.

"He was a great basketball player in his day," recalled Reitzes of his father. "He used to liken [his approach] to being a guard and 'feeding' the ball, being in the background. I watched him in his job. He was really good at it. He was extremely successful doing his job not being in the limelight, and letting the leadership or other staff be in the spotlight."

Speaking about his own career, Reitzes, 58, said you "have to know when it's time to leave a dream position."

According to some schools of thought, he said, it's after five years. "At 10 [years], I was starting to think it's time to think about getting out... I felt it was in the best interests of me personally, and the community, to get someone new who has the same level of excitement that I had when I started."

Newly enthused about the strategic and international aspects of the roles he is taking on, Reitzes continues to work for the federation on a part-time basis in its Israel and Overseas area, as well as doing consulting work and serving as an adviser to the director general of the Jewish Agency.

He expects to spend a significant portion of his time in Israel, where he lived and worked for two stints in the 1970s. Reitzes first worked as a research assistant at Hebrew University's school of social work, and later as an assistant professor at Haifa University's school of social work, as well as a senior adviser on social service delivery to the Israeli northern coastal region.

Before moving to Toronto in 1982, when he joined the federation as budget director – his first of several positions here – Reitzes served as assistant executive director of the JCC in Tidewater, Va.

Toronto's Jewish community has grown dramatically since that time, said Reitzes. Even in 1991, the Jewish population was only 125,000, compared to an estimated 180,000 today.

"One of the big challenges, of course, was meeting the demands that came with growth like that," he said. Reitzes viewed it as "a great opportunity, because most communities are shrinking. Toronto is one of the few in North America that's growing."

He attributes the quality of Toronto's Jewish life to an extensive and well-populated Jewish day school system, as well as to a relatively high number of Holocaust survivors, who he said have contributed strength and Yiddishkeit to the community.

Reitzes said his first priority in 1992, when he took on the top federation position, was to help the community realize its potential. Much of that involved restructuring to better integrate different parts of the organization, he explained. Another major focus was fundraising, keeping future needs of Toronto's Jewish community at the forefront.

Its most recent iteration is Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, Reitzes said, referring to the ambitious project focused on the recent redevelopment of the Miles Nadal JCC and the building of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life downtown, the Lipa Green/Bathurst Jewish Centre complex in northern Toronto, and the new 50-acre multi-purpose "campus" expected to open in 2006 in Richmond Hill.

"I like to think the federation is really an expression of the community. When you think about what we do and what [the $65 million UJA campaign] supports – Jewish education, the most vulnerable, Israel – it's really the heart of Jewish community life."

Extra effort made to shelter homeless during cold snap

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

With wind chills making local temperatures feel like -30 degrees, Toronto community groups are making an extra effort to provide food and shelter to the homeless and others in need.

Synagogues that are taking part in the city-wide Out of the Cold program include Temple Har Zion, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, Beth Sholom Synagogue, Beth Tzedec Synagogue, Holy Blossom and Darchei Noam Congregation.

Steve Borlak, who co-ordinates Temple Har Zion's Out of the Cold program that runs Wednesday evenings, says that under normal conditions, the synagogue accommodates about 70 guests for dinner and 22 or 23 guests to stay overnight.

But this past week, they had 29 overnight guests, he says.

"We want everyone who comes to feel like guests, so we do not like to cram them in. This week, though, we had to make an exception."

Borlak says that at the beginning of the evening, they had put a few possible overnight guests on standby.

"When I announced that I was allowing extra guests to sleep over and that they would not have the usual amount of space, the guests burst into applause. They knew we were doing what we could to help out."

When they handed out the vinyl mattresses, he says, they had to arrange them geometrically so there was some space to walk.

"Everyone was wonderful. They knew we were working under extreme conditions and they took it well."

A lot of people remain on the streets unless conditions are severe, says Borlak.

"They are accustomed to uncomfortable conditions. When volunteers meet the guests at the Finch subway station to take them to the temple, it is the volunteers who are cold. The guests do not complain. They are used to it."

Marilyn Wise, who co-ordinates the Out of the Cold program at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, which started for the season this past week, says that due to the extreme cold, they were preparing for a capacity number of guests.

"Our program allows for 90 guests to eat dinner and 30 guests to sleep over. We are limited to the number of guests we take in because we pre-order kosher dinners, and we cannot order extra on the spot," she says.

They have a lot of warm clothing to hand out, she says, including down-filled coats, sleeping bags and emergency kits for guests who cannot sleep at the synagogue.

"Due to health risks, we cannot crowd people into the synagogue. We have to balance between helping guests out and not putting them at risk."

The program at Beth Emeth typically begins just before dinner, but if someone arrives at the synagogue early, they are let in. "We do not force anyone to stay outside in the cold. Volunteers will mingle with the guests until the actual program begins."

Beth Sholom Synagogue's Out of the Cold program runs Tuesday nights in partnership with Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

Margaret Weinstein, one of the co-ordinators of the program, whose season began last week, says they were prepared for a capacity number of guests, but did not get as many as they anticipated.

"We never know what motivates guests to come and what motivates them to go to another location," Weinstein says. "We are always prepared for them, however."

Synagogues filled to capacity

They usually have 80 or 90 people for dinner, of which 30 sleep over.

"We planned on letting a few extra stay over, but it was not necessary."

Darryl Borden, director of homeless initiatives at Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, is "overwhelmed with joy at the Jewish community's response to his organization's efforts to help the homeless.

"People have responded 180 per cent. We have distributed 40,000 pairs of socks due to a sock drive that went way over the top," he says.

Borden goes out on the Street Help Van two mornings a week to "wake up my homeless clients and get their circulation going."

Last week, he says, he was surprised at how few people were actually sleeping on the streets. "About 60 per cent of my regular clients sought shelter for two or three days. That is due, in part, to a very successful campaign by several agencies to warn people of the impending cold."

The Jewish community plays a crucial role in helping people out, he says. "I know that lives have been saved because of the community's efforts."

Borden urges readers to call the Street Help Line at 416-392-3777 if they see a street person who may need help, and to give the operator the location and a description of the person, if possible.

"One of the dozen outreach agencies will dispatch a vehicle, and we may have one less person on the street," he says.

THE U.S. WAR AGAINST TERROR IS FORCING AMERICANS . . .
. . .TO LIVE LIKE ISRAELIS!
WOW!
DRIVING RECKLESSLY, LIVING ON OVERDRAFTS, AND IGNORING THE DESTRUCTION OF THE ENVIRONMENT?

In a threat, the irony of truth

A barrage of diplomatic threats was uttered against Israel by the Palestinian Authority (PA) last week. They indicated ongoing duplicity, a creeping sense of desperation and an uncanny, unflagging resolve to never do the right thing for its people.

PA Prime Minister Ahmed Queria threatened to abandon the two-state solution for the conflict with Israel, and in its place, demand the imposition of a one-state solution, if Israel did not abandon the security fence it is erecting through the disputed territories.

Along similar lines, Saleh Rafat, a PLO committee member, said Israel's actions would not prevent the Palestinians from declaring "an independent Palestinian state within the 1967 border." Not to be left behind, PA cabinet minister Saeb Erekat propounded that a "two-state solution is the option of the Palestinian leadership," implying, of course, that if Israel did not do the PA's bidding, the PA would opt for a one-state model.

The Palestinians were responding to two specific developments: the continued construction of the separation fence and the declaration by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon two weeks ago that Israel might unilaterally disengage from the Palestinians if the Palestinian leadership did not take concrete steps to stop terror against Israel. The duplicity of the PA's threats is brazen; the foolishness is inexcusable.

The security fence and a possible unilateral Israeli disengagement from the Palestinians are both the result of Palestinian decisions.

The fence is the melancholy evidence of Palestinian unwillingness to stanch and uproot terror from within its midst. It was not an inevitability. Nor need it be in the future, even after it has been completed. Indeed, Sharon and the majority of the Likud party were opposed to its construction as an admission of failure, a sad statement about the lack of faith in the possibility of integrated economies and mutually beneficial coexistence between the two peoples.

The inescapable first and last principle about the security fence is this: had there been no terror, there would be no fence. The fence was brought to the Palestinians, like most of the misery in their lives, by their leader Yasser Arafat. Now that nearly one-third of the fence has been built and a new anti-Israel propaganda campaign has been launched in the West, this time specifically aimed at the fence, the PA leadership has added a new tactic in the retrogressive, counter-productive, illogical, self-harming war they wage against Israel: threatening to embrace a one-state solution, i.e. threatening to de-Judaize the Jewish state.

There is no place on earth other than tiny Israel where Jews are sovereign in their own land. Thus, the mere utterance of the "one-state" threat by the PA ironically proves to Israelis the value of building their security fence and further, of disengaging – even unilaterally – from the people who still seem more intent on tearing down their neighbour's national home than in building one of their own.

Re: Dora Wasserman

Dora Wasserman will remain forever the queen of the Yiddish Theatre in Montreal and throughout North America ("Wasserman eulogized for preserving and expanding Yiddish theatre," CJN, Jan 1). Her immense capacity to instil Yiddishkeit into the hearts of her troupe members and Montreal Jews will forever be cherished.

With the respect and admiration she inspired among French and English actors and theatre directors, it's no wonder she was the doyenne – the dean – of Yiddish theatre.

My daughter Malca Monica Bergman – Malcala, as Dora used to call her – was a part of Dora's troup's dance team for many years. On numerous Friday evenings, the troupe congregated in our house. These evenings never ended before the wee hours of the morning. The joy, the songs, the jokes and the friendships were a great source of inspiration for those youngsters. With great love, youthful exuberance and creative intelligence, Dora masterminded the energies and talent of her troupe.

Dora left a rich legacy: her daughter, Bryna, herself an extremely talented actress and capable theatre director, will continue to keep high the flame of the Yiddish Theatre in Montreal. The fire will continue to warm the hearts of the Montreal Jewish community.

Congress responds

It is with surprise that I read the critical comments made by Holocaust survivor Jean-Jacques Fraenkel, who said that Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, did not provide survivors with the information they needed to claim compensation from the French government ("Survivor fights for compensation from French government," CJN, Sept. 18, 2003 in French; Jan. 1, 2003 in English).

I was surprised because it was CJC who introduced Fraenkel to the Jewish media. In fact, the interview itself was arranged by the CJC as part of our efforts to disseminate the information to any survivors of French origin who may be affected by the restitution issue Fraenkel has so passionately championed. Furthermore we arranged an interview for him with Radio Shalom, which he praised in the article as effective.

CJC transmitted the information generated by the Coordination offshore des enfants survivants de la Shoah ayant vécu en France to our constituency, which includes all synagogues and Jewish organizations in Montreal. As well, members of CJC's Quebec region, including its president, Joseph Gabay, actively participated in a meeting on this issue that also included Frankel and the French consul general in Montreal. CJC was pleased to extend its assistance to Fraenkel as part of its ongoing commitment to Holocaust-related issues.

Over the years, Congress has played a key role in securing various Holocaust restitution settlements and in protecting the interests of Canadian survivors. When specific needs fall outside the scope of CJC's mandate, we set survivors up with the appropriate institution or service. A longstanding member of the Claims Conference, Congress recently gave a Canadian Holocaust survivor the seat reserved for its executive vice-president, to ensure full participation of the Canadian survivor community in all matters relating to restitution. Congress' website, www.cjc.ca, provides detailed information and relevant links to additional information on restitution claims and filing. Survivors requiring assistance can call the Information Line for Holocaust Survivors and their families, a project of the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors, at 514-345-6434.

Sarner's article caught me by surprise when he described in detail, at the beginning of the fourth paragraph, his wife's safta (grandmother) Marcelle Ballas. What made me stop reading altogether was her name. I also have a safta with that name living in Israel. She, too, is from Iraq and was part of the mass immigration to Israel in 1951.

My safta Marcelle Ballas is a strong, resilient person who has endured hardship and suffering. She is a remarkable woman and has overcome much adversity since leaving Iraq at the age of 27 with three small children, including a three-week-old infant (my father). From living in the tents of the mabara (absorption camp) and moving to a one-room apartment to losing her husband at a very young age and finally settling in Ramat Gan (home to many of Iraq's Jews), her sad story is also filled with the happiness of her three children, six grandchildren and three great-grand children. Clearly, my safta is not the same woman as Sarner's safta. Yet remarkably, they share the exact same name and a similar, touching story, common to many Iraqi Jews.

After reading the article, I was flooded with questions and contacted Sarner. The Ballas name is not ordinary and I have never encountered another Ballas member outside of my immediate family. Losing my grandfather before I was born and having no contact with the extended Ballas family, I know very little about our countless relatives (aside from the stories my safta tells, which tend to focus less on the lives of the Ballas relatives and more on her wonderful memories of her life in Iraq and her sorrow at having left such a happy existence.) This encounter has come at a significant time for me, as I recently became engaged and I will soon leave aside my maiden name of Ballas and adopt my husband's last name.

Iraq was once the hub of the Jewish world. Its Jews have a rich and vibrant heritage. The food, language, music and culture make it unique. Despite having an Ashkenazi mother, I have always felt drawn to my Iraqi roots because of the warmth of the Iraqi Jews and their culture. It is time that people recognize and celebrate the Jews of Iraq.

Perspectives

Reconciliation with the Palestinians is necessary – and possible

By SMADAR MEIRI-ORDYNANS

At the height of the second intifadah, in the autumn of 2001, I stood beside my father in the reception hall of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto in a small crowd that had surrounded Israeli author and peace activist Amos Oz, eager to hear further words of hope. Oz had just given a profoundly moving address in the synagogue's sanctuary to an audience of a few thousand about the deterioration of the Middle East peace process. At one point during the talk, my father, who is in his 70s and was missing significant amounts of Oz's lecture because of a hearing problem, turned to me and said in both Hebrew and Arabic, "W'alla, zeh oto jacket hu lovesh kol shanah" – "By God, that's the same tweed jacket he wears every year!" The comical digression was a welcome relief from hearing about the tragic conflict between the Israelis and the Palestinians that has lasted five decades.

The political developments and peacemaking endeavours in Israel and the Middle East have been a source of unrelenting concern for many like myself, my parents and peace activists such as Oz. Over the years, I have decided that my father is an accurate barometer, if you will, in understanding the Middle East and in having foresight in the area of reconciliation with the Arab world and, in particular, the Palestinian people.

My father, Avner Meiri, an Iraqi (Babylonian) immigrant to Israel who ran for a seat in the Knesset three times as a member of the Labor party Mapam in the late 1950s and early 1960s (he lost only marginally), has always been a proponent of achieving reconciliation through territorial compromises and extended dialogue with Israel's adversaries, as opposed to resorting to heavy-handed military solutions. As a political science undergraduate at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem during the 1950s, my father often conversed with then-Israel Defence Forces chief of staff (and fellow student) Moshe Dayan, who was also taking a course in international relations at Hebrew University.

Dayan later became minister of defence in Golda Meir's Labor government and the general responsible for Israel's capture during the 1967 Six Day War of the currently disputed lands of the West Bank, Gaza and Golan Heights. The Six Day War, which began supposedly defensively as the Arabs began mobilizing against Israel, led to the complicated scenario we currently are enduring. Israeli author and Ha'aretz journalist Yossi Melman wrote in the 1992 book The New Israelis that Dayan eventually "knew that maintaining the status quo in the territories following the 1967 war was potentially disastrous."

And most recently, in Michael Oren's Six Days of War, we learned that, on the war's second day, then-U.S. president Lyndon Johnson drew up a plan for Israel to exchange the captured lands for Arab recognition of the Jewish state. Back then, the American administration's intention was clear: despite the fact that the captured lands were a small portion of the area that had been ancient biblical Israel – that is, a fragment of God's biblical commandment proclaiming Jewish sovereignty over lands extending from the Mediterranean Sea to the Euphrates River – annexation of the lands was not logical nor foreseeable.

In 1947, the United Nations voted for a partition plan to divide the area west of the Jordan River into Israel and Palestine, but only the Jews, headed by David Ben-Gurion, agreed to it. Upon the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, Israel was attacked by five surrounding Arab countries, but only between 5,000 and 6,000 Palestinians took part in the war. In 1949, a truce was signed between Israel and the Arab countries, ignoring their identity as Palestinians and referring to them as refugees of former Trans-Jordan.

It was only after the Six Day War that the Palestinians gained recognition as a distinct displaced people. Ever since this period, successive Israeli governments, both Labor and Likud, have refused to succumb to Palestinian terrorism, particularly after the failed Camp David 2000 negotiations when the terror escalated to proportions and frequency beyond everyone's imagination. From an Israeli military perspective, any capitulation to acts of terror would be a sign of weakness. As a result of years of sustained Palestinian terror, despotic leadership and refusal to recognize the legitimacy of the Jewish people and their history, legitimate Palestinian grievances of continual humiliation have not been given significant credence by the international community.

In 1990, I went on a group tour to Israel with 300 young Jewish North Americans. On the trip, I had the privilege of hearing and meeting members of the Israeli Parliament from both the right and left wing. As the sole voice of dissent on Israel's approach to the Middle East conflict, I asked Likud MP Benjamin Netanyahu whether the continual development of settlements and Israel's refusal to negotiate with the Palestinians was causing a greater escalation of the conflict than ever before since Islamic terrorist groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad were becoming more extreme. Netanyahu's response was that the whole world was being threatened and he did not see any correlation between the increasing extremes and Israel's policies toward the Palestinians. It seemed to me that Netanyahu's unfathomable pain from the great, needless loss of his brother Jonathan during a rescue raid in Entebbe, Uganda, had made him and like-minded leaders completely distrustful of the Arab world, and they were reciprocating with tactics that moved Israel further away from the efforts required to attain a peaceful settlement.

One has to ask now, how did the Israelis and Palestinians go from almost reaching an agreement at Camp David in 2000 – except for the exact status of Jerusalem and the right of the Arab refugees to return to Israel – to a war that the present Israeli government is calling a "fight for its existence"? Avoiding political dialogue since the demise of these negotiations has undermined the trust that existed between the 70 per cent of Israelis and approximately 70 per cent of Palestinians who support two states side by side. During peace negotiations, wouldn't it be sensible to allot time for reflection on viewpoints, arguments and sustained dialogue?

Dismal as they may seem, there are encouraging attempts to promote trust and dialogue once again, such as the American and European-led road map peace plan. As well, in 2003, for the first time, the Palestinian Authority's conference with radical Palestinian factions to bring about a final cessation in the use of violence and a change in their mandate to destroy Israel, suggests a possible resumption of serious political negotiations, assuming there is genuine will from all parties. If the Irish Republican Army and Great Britain were able to agree on a ceasefire and total cessation of violence in July 1997, then the same prospects should be achieved in the Middle East. At this time in history, who better than the western world as a role model? On Israel's part, the challenge remains to consolidate a politically and religiously diverse public to support and implement a final comprehensive peace plan. Inevitably, a peace agreement would sustain the Jewish identity of the State of Israel and encourage the continual sustainability of a secure Jewish Diaspora.

It is conceivable and hopeful that there is a will to bring about the reconciliation long overdue between Israel and its Arab communities, with both communities respectful of their historical and religious commonalities and differences in the Middle East, the Jewish people being 5,764 years old and the Muslim people being 13 centuries old. The past has shown that both peoples have lived peacefully, more or less, for centuries in the same neighbourhood.

Low profile in Stockholm

As I walked out of a synagogue in Stockholm one Shabbat morning last December, a worshipper advised me to take off my kippah – "for your own safety and for peace in the community." As a Holocaust survivor, he said he knew what he was talking about. The situation in the streets of the Swedish capital reminded him of earlier days in his native Poland.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Though I'm sure he exaggerated, others I talked to also stressed the need for caution. Sweden is now part of the European Union and many Europeans have reverted to their former anti-Jewish stance, albeit in a different mutation. In the decades after the Holocaust, displays of anti-Semitism had become disreputable. That is no longer the case.

Behind the shift is the growing number of Muslims in Europe. In Sweden, which has a population of some nine million, there are no more than 20,000 Jews, but half-a-million Muslims, virtually all relatively new immigrants.

A recent symposium about Muslim anti-Semitism in a Swedish-Jewish journal showed that most Muslims want to live well with Jews and non-Jews alike. Many responsible Swedes, not least its prime minister, are appalled by anti-Semitism and determined to fight it. Yet there are enough "militants" who shape the profile of the Muslim minority and make non-Muslim politicians condone their "activism."

Muslim "militants" justify their conduct by pointing to the way Israel treats Palestinians. By making life difficult for their Jewish neighbours in Stockholm or Paris, they say they are showing solidarity with their brethren in the West Bank and Gaza. When it comes to persecuting Jews, it seems that almost any argument will do.

A second source of attacks on Jews comes from neo-Nazis who feel that the European paradise has let them down and it's the fault of "others." They lash out against Jews and Muslims alike. But that doesn't seem to be enough to make common cause in the fight against prejudice so that Sweden remains the kind of open and just society it aspired to become when I was growing up there in the 1940s and '50s.

Though I normally don't wear a kippah in the street, I was tempted to do so now as an act of defiance. But in the end cowardice won out. Others called it prudence, for "it's not good to provoke hostility." In saying so they implied, scandalously, that anti-Semitism is the fault of its victims, not the problem of the Gentiles.

I'm writing this in Jerusalem, the capital of the sovereign State of Israel, where I hope I'll never be told by anybody to remove my kippah in the name of prudence and that no Jew will ever compel me to put it on in the name of conformity.

At stake in Israel's war on terror

At a reception hosted by the Jewish National Foundation in Calgary recently, I heard a speech that helped me understand not only how fortunate we are to live where we do, but how incredibly fragile our way of life really is.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

Edmonton Journal columnist Lorne Gunter spoke about the war on Israel from the refreshing and thought-provoking angle of how its struggles with other nations are symbolic of a war that is also being waged on the West.

He began his speech by recounting an anecdote from fellow journalist David Frum, who wrote about his observations upon passing by a kindergarten one day.

Frum described seeing a teacher consulting a group of children about the activity they would most prefer to engage in.

Even at this young age, Frum recalled, the children knew how to express their choice and demonstrated the knowledge that they must abide by the majority decision.

He then concluded that this rule of law and understanding of democracy is taught to all of us from birth.

That's why it's so easy for those in the West to forget how fragile, how new and how unique our way of life is compared to the rest of the world.

"Democracy is a mere blip in our existence that could be erased tomorrow. Look at the number of cultures who are willing to demolish it," Gunter said.

"We assume everyone outside of the Western world wants what we have. But a sizeable majority wants nothing to do with it. They want us and our way of life gone, or at least seriously weakened."

It's scary when you think about how true that is. So much in life seems to revolve around a struggle for power – whether in personal relationships or in those between nations. History's dictators have traditionally seen democracy as a threat, but what they continually fail to realize is that when you suppress free will, it is likely to backfire against you.

Gunter likened the role of Israel in the fight for Western civilization to being on the front lines of a battle, and cited an example from last year of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon being forced to call an election nine months early despite being in the midst of a war.

"A new government was thus elected and democracy went on – this in spite of the fact that there was a war going on in their front yard. For this to have taken place without notice is miraculous."

Gunter compared this to what happened in the Palestinian Authority in September 2002, when the European Union placed pressure on PA President Yasser Arafat to hold a presidential election.

Arafat consented to hold a vote on Jan. 28, 2003, but called it off on Dec. 20, saying that ongoing violence precluded him from holding free and fair elections.

"This is notwithstanding the fact that Arafat started the war and was responsible for maintaining it," Gunter said. "He could have put a hold on the war if he was really serious about holding elections."

Gunter also cited the nine peace accords – among them Oslo, Hebron and Camp David – initiated by Israel over the past 10 years as examples of the maturity of Israeli society.

"I cannot think of any other nation who has offered as much when it did not lose the war."

The columnist concluded his remarks by describing Israel as a mature and sophisticated democracy living next to a far less sophisticated political culture.

"It's not just Israelis or Palestinians in this war, and more people are seeing this with the recent bombings in Turkey and Saudi Arabia," he said, pointing to terrorist activity as far away as South America and Africa, and anti-Israel sentiment closer to home at a protest in Calgary last March in which Sharon was equated with Adolf Hitler.

In my opinion, Gunter is disturbingly accurate in his view that not just Israel, but all of Western civilization and liberal democracy is under attack.

For as he says, "If we allow it to be snuffed out in Israel, I don't know how much longer it will be before it is snuffed out in the rest of the world."

Home for Chanukah: the clichés are true

Coming home for winter break is always an adventure. First, there is moving back in with the parents, which, no matter how relaxed they are, always proves to be a challenge for students adjusted to a life of independence away from home. Then there is the onslaught of family you haven't seen in months and the volume of food that any such gathering entails. And you can't forget seeing old friends from high school and making up for lost time. Yes, winter vacation is fun, perhaps even restful, but it's definitely not dull.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

I have to say that I enjoy going to school clear across the country from my dear home in Toronto. The Maritime pace suits me, and frankly, distance is a good thing. So, count me as a converted Haligonian. Even my driver's licence affirms that I am a Nova Scotian (which makes for some weird looks at Toronto bars).

The upside of being an out-of-towner is the thrill of returning to Toronto and the fringe benefits that such a status brings. Let's be honest: absence does indeed make the heart grow fonder, and when you are only back with the family for a few weeks, there is much to be done and little time in which to do it.

Once you get past the shock of moving back in with the parents, you come to realize that it has undeniable advantages. When you come home so rarely, everyone is excited to see you – translated into "Jewish," that means everyone wants to cook your favourites for you. Yes, the jolting change is undoubtedly lessened by chicken soup with Bubbie's kneidlach, an abundance of kosher steaks (a rarity in Halifax) and all the other family specialties – not to mention heating that works and a kitchen stocked with gadgets and appliances that students can only dream of.

Of course, there is more to coming home than a good meal and some modern conveniences. It's nice to see family. Quality time with Mom and Dad, as well as the aforementioned family gatherings, are essential to any visit. This year, the calendar worked in my favour, as I was able to attend what I call the "Gantze Grossman Chanukah Party." From great aunts on down to the youngest of second cousins – however many times removed – the crew gets together once a year on the first Sunday of Chanukah for an event I have missed since I moved out East. It's sheer craziness with such a huge family, but it's admittedly a comfort to be surrounded by mishpachah when you're usually out on your own.

The clichés are true: you do gain an appreciation for things when you don't have them. On New Year's Eve, I spent the night with my best friends from high school. The five of us remain close, and despite the fact we're spread across the country from Vancouver to Waterloo, from Kingston to Halifax, we manage to keep communications going. And even when that fails, winter break is the one time we can reunite and relive our (perhaps not so) glorious high school days.

Maybe that's what coming home is all about. It's about the nostalgia of climbing into your tiny twin-size bed once you've experienced the wider world of doubles. It's about being taken care of again, at least for a short time, and realizing that sometimes it can be nicer than taking care of yourself. My time in Toronto helps me appreciate all the things I wouldn't appreciate if I still lived there. You can't get sushi at midnight on a Sunday in Halifax, just like you can't peruse the old albums you left at home with the parents.

I have to answer in the affirmative when people jokingly ask if I am ready to go back to school, because the fact is, I always am. But I can only be ready to return to Halifax after that satisfying dose of family, friends, creature comforts and nostalgia.

It was quite the month, and coming home remains quite the trip.

The Kirshner File

The United States and its coalition partners won the war, but have yet to win the peace, in Iraq. Ten months after allied armies stormed into Baghdad, toppling Saddam Hussein's dictatorial Baathist regime in a lightning military campaign, Iraq is far from stabilized.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Although much of the country remains reasonably calm, the so-called Sunni triangle – an area in central Iraq north and west of the capital – seethes with violence.

Since U.S. President George W. Bush melodramatically swooped down on an American aircraft carrier in the Persian Gulf and declared an end to major combat last May, the situation in Iraq has deteriorated. More than 225 American soldiers – and tens of allied troops from countries such as Britain, Italy, Bulgaria and Poland – have been killed in attacks mounted by Saddam loyalists, Iraqi nationalists, Islamic fundamentalists, foreign fighters and criminal gangs. Last week, Al Qaeda fugitive Osama bin Laden urged them to step up their attacks.

During the past eight months, scores of Iraqi police officers and political and religious leaders – including the deputy mayor of Baghdad and the prominent Shiite cleric Ayatollah Mohammed Bakr al-Hakim – have been assassinated. And suicide bombers have struck the offices of the United Nations and the Red Cross and the embassies of Jordan and Turkey, all with devastating results.

Mideast Analysis

The perpetrators of these atrocities share three overlapping objectives: to drive out the "infidel" Americans, to force the departure of international organizations that recognize and work in tandem with the allied occupation, and to murder the representatives of foreign powers that backed the invasion.

At first, Pentagon officials from Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on down claimed that the guerrilla raids were too haphazard to qualify as a full-blown insurgency. And Bush, in a patently foolish remark, dared the insurgents to attack U.S. forces. "Bring 'em on!" he said. But last July, the commander of allied forces in the Mideast, Gen. John Abizaid, admitted that the United States faces a classic guerrilla war in Iraq.

In retrospect, the Bush administration launched the invasion with a set of unrealistic assumptions. The first was that Iraqis would rise up to welcome the Americans. And while Kurds and Shiites, both of whom were persecuted by Saddam's Sunni regime, hailed his downfall and have generally co-operated with the United States, the Sunnis have remained generally hostile.

Comprising about a quarter of Iraq's population of 25 million, the Sunnis ruled Iraq for much of its modern history, placing the majority Shiites, as well as the Kurds, in subordinate positions. When the Shiites and the Kurds, at the instigation of the United States, rose up against Saddam in the wake of the 1991 Gulf War, he exacted retribution, murdering thousands of them.

With Saddam languishing in prison after being captured in ignominious circumstances on Dec. 13, and with the centres of Sunni dominance in the Baath party, the army and the security forces having been broken by U.S. civil administrator Paul Bremer, the Sunnis are no longer kingmakers. They fear that future Iraqi governments will be under the sway of Shiites and that the power and privileges they once enjoyed will evaporate.

The Sunnis should be worried. They are already a minority in the 25-member Iraqi Governing Council, which rules Iraq in conjunction with the United States. And when the Americans officially transfer power to an Iraqi government on June 30, the long-oppressed Shiites presumably will be in charge.

It is even possible that the new Iraqi government will be moderately Islamic and under the guiding influence of a Shiite ayatollah, Ali al-Sistani, who returned from exile in Iran after Saddam's ouster. The Americans probably did not imagine that power might pass into the hands of an Islamic cleric.

Similarly, as the American deputy secretary of defence, Paul Wolfowitz, conceded recently, the United States mistakenly assumed that many Iraqi army officers and police would join the monumental effort to rebuild Iraq. In fact, the majority of these individuals have boycotted the Provisional Coalition Authority – the occupation force administering Iraq – and some have even joined the ranks of the estimated 5,000 guerrillas currently battling the Americans.

Bremer stirred widespread resentment when he disbanded the Iraqi army and rendered its formerly privileged officer corps jobless.

The Bush administration also miscalculated by assuming that it alone could stabilize Iraq. Washington has since learned that it cannot rebuild Iraq's shattered infrastructure, nor reduce Iraq's immense foreign debts, without outside help.

The task of putting Iraq back together again will eventually cost hundreds of billions dollars, a undertaking the United States obviously cannot shoulder by itself. Bush has promised to stay the course. But it is debatable whether the American public, already burdened by a commitment to bring order to Afghanistan, will tolerate hefty tax increases and escalating casualties for the sake of stabilizing Iraq.

Saddam Hussein just after his capture

Washington also needs external assistance to whittle down Iraq's towering debts of $120 billion (US), a legacy of Saddam's futile wars and of crippling United Nations economic sanctions. Debt reduction is absolutely critical if Iraq is to make the transition from anarchy and impoverishment to freedom and prosperity. James Baker, the American secretary of state during the first Gulf War, has been appointed to achieve that key objective. To succeed, he will need the co-operation of countries such as France, Russia and Germany, which opposed the war and hold tens of billions of Iraq's loans. Certainly, the United States will not engender goodwill by awarding lucrative reconstruction contracts only to nations that supported the war.

Be that as it may, the rebuilding of Iraq will remain in doubt until the United States crushes the current insurrection, the most serious Iraqi rebellion since the British occupation after World War I.

U.S. anti-insurgency tactics have moved through three phases since the fall of Baghdad last April.

Initially, the United States hit the rebels frequently and hard, but in August, the U.S. command began to limit the scope of its raids so as not to alienate the fickle Iraqi public.

With the intensification of the insurgency in November, a month in which 81 Americans were killed by hostile fire – including 39 in the downing of three helicopters – the United States hardened its strategy. In an echo of Israel's counter-insurgency methods in the West Bank and Gaza, U.S. commanders have imprisoned relatives and friends of suspected guerrillas, cordoned off villages and towns, razed buildings and made wider and better use of intelligence and air power.

The strategy has paid handsome dividends. Saddam, looking like a bedraggled and confused vagrant, was captured alive after a tip from an apprehended trusted confederate. Saddam's capture, the best news out of Iraq since the violent death of his two sons last July, was a stunning psychological blow to the guerrillas. But judging by continuing U.S. casualties, Saddam's incarceration will definitely not end the insurgency, which eerily resembles the guerrilla war Israel faced in southern Lebanon until May 2000.

The uprising may last longer than many analysts thought. It is well financed and seems to enjoy the support of some Iraqis. Israel, through two intifadahs, has learned that rebellions can take on a life of their own.

Yet this hardly means that the insurrection cannot be contained. With enough manpower and firepower, and the support of sufficient numbers of Iraqis, the United States can restore security in Iraq. And with the restoration of calm, the Americans can win the battle for hearts and minds by delivering basic services – from electricity to water – and getting substantial oil exports flowing again.

Countless Iraqis were glad to be liberated from Saddam, but they may turn against the United States if it does not stabilize Iraq. In a bleak report released late last year, the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency warned that ordinary Iraqis could lose faith in the United States and the Iraqi Governing Council if the guerrillas' reign of terror is not stopped.

It is essential for the United States to pacify Iraq and launch it on the road toward stability and democracy, much in the manner of postwar Germany and Japan. These objectives are far more important than the fruitless hunt for weapons of mass destruction, which may have been destroyed after the 1991 war.

If the United States fails in Iraq, regressive forces will prevail, not only in Iraq but in the entire Middle East, and Israel's long-term security may yet be jeopardized.

MARTIN DANIEL INTERIORS FURNISHINGS FROM ITALY

New book sings praises of active seniors

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Irene Borins Ash wants to know what makes people tick – especially older people.

A consultant on aging and the author of Treasured Legacies, Older and Still Great, Borins Ash specializes in helping seniors develop a healthy attitude toward aging.

For her book, Borins Ash, a social worker who has studied why some people age well while others become despondent and depressed, interviewed and photographed about 50 seniors from all backgrounds.

What they all had in common, she says, was their "ability to age with purpose, joy and achievement."

The seeds for her book were planted after she presented a paper at a meeting of the Ontario Gerontology Association in 1999.

"While there, I talked to about seven seniors who had aged well despite difficulties," Borins Ash says. "They had the same problems as others, yet they remained joyous. I was curious. Why did these people have such a healthy attitude toward aging?"

Preparing to give a talk at the Fourth Global Conference of the International Federation of Aging in Montreal that same year, she decided to photograph these seniors.

The photographs became the foundation for her exhibit displayed at Koffler Gallery titled "Life Journeys: An Exploration Through Images and Thought."

Subsequent exhibits, titled "Treasured Legacies," were held at Holy Blossom Temple and Toronto City Hall in June 2003 as part of Seniors' Month.

While interviewing subjects for her exhibit, and later, for the book, she learned that healthy aging is more a result of attitude than socioeconomic background.

"Baby boomers seem to think that aging well is about physical attributes. These seniors, however, are aging from the inside out. Their spirit has remained young.

"They are not afraid of wrinkles or grey hair, or even their own death. They are concerned about leaving a positive legacy; they want to make each day richer. Rather than being self centred, they are compassionate."

When people sweep their age under the carpet, she says, "the age sneaks up on you. It is more important to address it and accept it."

Among the subjects in her book is Jerome Diamond, a social worker and former executive director of Jewish Family and Child Services in Toronto.

During last summer's power blackout, says Borins Ash, Diamond, who was born in 1915, divided his apartment building into teams and taught them how to use candles safely.

"It was so typical of him. This is what he knows how to do."

Many of the seniors are religious and spiritual, she says, "and all have come to terms with past pain and anger. With Holocaust survivors, for example, if they can come to some resolution, they can move on and live a better life."

Nathan Leipciger was born in Poland in 1928 and lost his whole family in the Holocaust. In her book, Borins Ash wrote that after being silent for years about his experiences, he joined the UJA Federation's Holocaust education committee and now speaks at schools across Canada.

In 1990, Leipciger became a representative on a council advising the Polish government on matters of preserving and commemorating Poland's six death camps.

"In spite of past suffering, Nathan remains optimistic," Borins Ash says. "He devotes many hours and a great deal of energy to educating people. He believes that through education we can gain understanding and acceptance of others, no matter what their ethnic origin, religion or cultural background may be."

She says she wanted to show that people can live rich, productive lives in nursing homes, so she included Ann Seaton, who was born in 1917 and moved into a nursing home in 1988 so she could get the care she needs.

"Ann feels that she is living some of the best and most rewarding years of her life, as she is free to explore life with no worries about cooking, cleaning and household responsibilities. She has made a decision to enjoy each day to its fullest, as she doesn't know what tomorrow will bring."

Seniors can find or create a purpose for living that is stronger than whatever physical or mental disabilities may slow them down, Borins Ash says.

"They can teach us to focus on celebrating both similarities and differences in our diverse society. They are our treasured legacies."

Borins Ash will be speaking and signing books at Israel's Judaica Centre, 897 Eglinton Ave. W. on March 14.

OUR FOUNDATION FOR THE FUTURE

Teens show they care about making the world a better place.

Making our voices heard.

Six young Toronto teens who recently celebrated their Bar or Bat Mitzvah turned gifts they received into gifts they could give.

With their parents' help, they found a simple, meaningful way to change lives in our community – they created Bar and Bat Mitzvah Funds at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

"The most important thing about a Bar or Bat Mitzvah Fund is that it allows you to make a difference. We enjoy giving. It is a powerful way for us to help change the world. It is a chance to express ourselves. And it is the best opportunity to support the Jewish causes we really care about," says Sarah Nadal (who celebrated her Bat Mitzvah in 2003).

At an age when teens are defining themselves, there is no better way to introduce them to the rewards of giving than to start a Bar or Bat Mitzvah Fund. These teens set the wheels in motion either by asking their guests to make donations to their funds in lieu of gifts before their Bar or Bat Mitzvah, or by deciding to set up a Bar or Bat Mitzvah Fund with a portion of the gifts they received.

The Jewish Foundation discusses with the teens where they would like to give the money from their fund - it's an important part of the program. The choices are endless. Young philanthropists may decide to contribute to the UJA Federation Annual Campaign, the Victims of Terror Fund or Jewish Family & Child Service, for example. They may support the environment, Jewish education, the homeless, the hungry, or any cause for which they feel a commitment. The key to these funds is that the teens themselves choose how they want to support the Jewish community.

"We want our teens, as Jews, to care about the world they live in. But the truth is – they already do. They just need a way to express how much they care. Their Bar or Bat Mitzvah is the perfect time to empower them, to allow them to begin to make their voices heard," says Clifford Hendler, father of Daniel who celebrated his Bar Mitzvah in 2002 and started the Hendler Family Bar Mitzvah Fund.

"Starting a Bar or Bat Mitzvah Fund in their own names introduces young adults to a lifelong habit of philanthropy," says Carol Kassel, Director of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. "It exposes them to a diverse group of people and Jewish organizations that are working to improve Jewish lives here at home, in Israel and around the world. At the same time, they learn how money works in the real world."

Q I am recently retired. Towards the end of my employment I received a number of stock options that are now of considerable value. I will have to exercise the options soon, as the term of the options is expiring. I receive a large pension that covers all of my expenses and therefore do not need the additional income from the stock options. Is it possible to exercise the options and then donate them to a charity?*

Marcy Ages is a Certified Financial Planner at T.E. Financial Consultants

A Donating your stock options to a registered charity is definitely something you should consider doing. When you exercise stock options you have to pay tax on the benefit you receive. The benefit is the difference between the exercise price of the option and the fair market value of the stock at the time you exercise the option. It is taxed as regular income. However, similar to the treatment of capital gains, you are entitled to a deduction of 50% of the income, which will reduce the taxes owing by 50%. When you donate publicly listed shares of corporations or mutual fund units you acquired through your employer's stock option plan you can also claim an additional 50% deduction. In other words you would only pay tax on 25% of the benefit when you donate your stock options to a registered charity. This is a significant savings.

In order to qualify for the additional 50% deduction you must meet all of the following conditions:

- The security must be acquired under an option that was granted to you as an employee of a corporation or a mutual fund trust.
- You must dispose of the security in the calendar year in which the option was exercised and not more than 30 days after its acquisition by donating it to a qualified registered charity that-is not a private foundation. A public foundation, such as the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, is a qualified recipient for a gift of stock options.
- You are otherwise entitled to claim a stock option and shares deduction on line 249 of your tax return.

You can choose to donate all or a part of your stock options. The process is quite simple and most charities have existing arrangements with stockbrokers to facilitate the transfer of the securities. If you are considering a charitable gift of stock options, please consult with a professional advisor such as a Financial Planner or Stock Broker with experience in these matters.

First degree murder trial in death of Orthodox Jew

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An Ontario judge concluded a preliminary hearing last week by committing Christopher Steven McBride for trial on charges of first degree murder in connection with the July 2002 stabbing death of David Rosenzweig, an Orthodox Jew.

Rosenzweig, a father of six, was stabbed in the back as he waited with his son Ezra for a tow truck outside a popular kosher restaurant on Bathurst Street, south of Lawrence Avenue. The senseless nature of the incident shocked the Jewish community, with B'nai Brith Canada president Rochelle Wilner saying it felt like "open season on Jews."

At the time of the murder, Toronto police chief Julian Fantino held a press conference during which he referred to the incident as "hate-motivated."

The murder was reported on CNN and it generated headlines in Israel.

Bernie Farber, national executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, said a trial should lay to rest concerns about the motivation behind the murder.

"There is a question hanging in the air. Was it a hate crime, or not?" he said.

The murder took place at a time of increased anti-Semitic activities in Canada and around the world. Farber acknowledged that many in the Jewish community quickly assumed the crime was motivated by hate. Whether that is the case or not should be determined at trial, he said, adding a trial should "bring closure" to the question.

Farber said Congress "tries to reflect the feeling of the community, and the feeling of the community was that it was a hate crime. Whether it can be proved in court is an entirely different matter."

Although a conviction for first degree murder carries with it the maximum possible sentence, a conviction on a lesser charge could open the possibility of enhanced sentencing if it can be shown the killing was hate-motivated, he added.

Rosenzweig's widow, Chavi, told reporters, "Justice has prevailed this day. Of course, our grieving continues and nothing will bring David back."

The reassurances come after one Holstein cow imported into Washington state from Alberta tested positive last month for bovine spongiform encephalopathy, or BSE, a fatal brain-wasting disease similar to the human variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, or CJD.

U.S. health officials believe the cow ate infected Canadian feed before crossing the border about two years ago. It's the first instance of mad cow in the United States and follows revelations last May of another case in Alberta.

A shochet would never accept a visibly sick cow such as the infected one found in Washington, Luss said.

A "downer" – an animal that can't walk to the slaughtering place on its own – would be rejected and not be considered kosher, he said. (Among new anti-mad cow measures announced recently by the U.S. Department of Agriculture is a ban on the use of "downer" cows in meatpacking plants.)

A cow's brain, spinal cord and lower intestines are most likely to carry BSE, which is believed to be spread by infected brain parts coming into contact with beef during the slaughtering process, or by an animal eating feed that contains parts of already contaminated animals.

In the kosher slaughtering process, "the brain is not eaten by anybody," and the spinal cord and lower intestines are removed before the remains of an animal are shipped, Rabbi Menachem Genack, rabbinic administrator of the Orthodox Union's kashrut division, told the New York Jewish Week.

Rabbi Levin said kosher slaughter also prohibits shooting or stunning cows in the head, which may cause brain matter to be dispersed to other parts of the body. Kosher slaughter mandates that the animal's throat be slit, and potentially contaminated blood be drained away from the carcass, he said.

In addition, while the diseased cow in Washington was believed to be 6½ years old, "kosher meat comes from very young cattle that have been thoroughly inspected, and consumers can be sure they are of top quality," said Manuel Tavares of Dominion Meat Packers Ltd., a federally inspected slaughtering plant that supplies kosher meat throughout Ontario.

Tavares said less than half the cows that arrive for kosher slaughter at his plant are used, as many do not meet kashrut standards.

"Any death attributed to mad cow disease has been as a result of consuming meat from older cattle. We only use meat from cattle that are under 30 months old," Luss added.

Rabbi Peretz Jaffe, kashrut co-ordinator of the Montreal Jewish Community Council (Vaad Hair), said he is concerned about mad-cow disease and expects the issue to be discussed at a meeting of the council this week.

He said virtually all the kosher meat sold in Montreal is slaughtered in Toronto at an abbatoir called Ryding Regency, and only a small amount is slaughtered in Quebec.

Most reports of humans contracting CJD from eating diseased beef occurred in the 1990s in the United Kingdom. So far, 139 cases have surfaced worldwide. Like the United States, not all countries have strict testing regimens in place.

Barry, a mashgiach in the kosher section of the Cavendish Mall IGA supermarket in Montreal who would not give his last name, said he has seen no drop in sales since the scare. "If people eat meat, what are they going to do? Become vegetarian?"

U.S. officials have said its tough new measures against mad cow protect the domestic feed supply and that it remains safe. Still, ground meat from the infected cow has been recalled from supermarkets in eight Western states and Guam. Luss said he is "happy" the United States has gotten involved in the mad cow issue because "they will educate the world and get the message out."

Orchestrating the American dream

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

Sam Bernstein, a New England industrialist who acquired the franchise to the Frederics hair-styling machine in the mid-1920s, became a remarkable overnight success after America was seized by a permanent-wave craze at the height of the flapper era.

"One day in 1927, I didn't have a nickel to my name," he used to say. "The next morning, I went into the office and it looked like every salon operator in New England wanted a Frederics. I couldn't handle all the orders with just a few people working for me, so I had to hire salesmen and secretaries and bookkeepers and shipping clerks and stockboys, all in a couple of days. I suddenly had money in the bank, credit everywhere, a name for myself – just because of Frederics. It was what you call the American Dream coming true."

A generation later, Sam's son Lenny experienced his own version of the American Dream. A budding composer and assistant conductor, Lenny was given the chance to conduct the New York Philharmonic when Bruno Walter suddenly took ill. His Carnegie Hall debut was a triumph: the audience "roared like one giant animal in a zoo," Lenny's brother, Burton, recalled. "It was certainly the loudest human sound I had ever heard – thrilling and eerie."

Burton Bernstein recorded many such pivotal moments in the history of his family in a charming 1982 narrative, Family Matters: Sam, Jennie and the Kids. Originally published in instalments in the New Yorker magazine, it appeared in book form the same year and was reprinted by backin print.com in 2000.

Rather than simply providing a hagiographical account of the early years of Leonard Bernstein (1918-1990), Burton presents a gripping and immensely readable study of the family's roots that focuses equally on his larger-than-life parents, Sam and Jennie, in part one, and on their three kids in part two.

The book details the anti-Semitic upheavals and other factors that forced 16-year-old Samuel ("Shmuel Yosef") Bernstein to flee from his hometown of Beresdiv, Ukraine. "While no full-fledged pogroms struck Beresdiv, several aftershocks were felt. Nightriders – usually local peasants who had dealt amiably with the Jews just a few hours before – would gallop into the shtetl and smash windows, set fires and terrorize the population."

It also provides many realistic details about the grueling two-week voyage to America, during which some passengers prayed continuously for their survival. "One day, the city skyline appeared like a row of fairy-tale castles, and they were herded ashore onto Ellis Island. The bleak, echoing halls, crammed with the frightened and the sick, were at least terra firma."

By the time Sam reluctantly brought his elderly parents to America in the pre-war era, he had grown so detached from his own past that they would forever be like strangers to him. Unable to adjust to America, they died bitter and forsaken, cursing themselves for having left their home.

The fully Americanized Bernsteins felt unable to connect to the tragedy of the Holocaust until much later, when Burton discovered a list of dead that included dozens of relatives: "After reading that death roster of people I never knew, not only did I understand the Holocaust, but I understood – for the first time, really – what my family was."

In addition to the riveting family history, Burton shares his privileged experiences with us as the kid brother of a famous composer. A pioneering genealogical study, Family Matters is an endearing and intimate portrait of a close-knit Jewish family that is a pleasure to read.

'A disturbing, even frightening book'

Preachers of Hate: Islam and the War on America*, by Kenneth R. Timmerman, Random House, $39.95.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This is a disturbing, even frightening book. It maintains that Jew-hatred has become so deeply rooted in Muslim societies in the past 80 years that it now forms part of the culture. Timmerman says, "Anti-Semitism is something people grow up with – it's like Mom and apple pie, or like certain popular television programs in the 1950s and 1960s in the United States. It's part of everyone's personal baggage. Everyone can relate to it."

And it is not just cultural, but deeply religious, Timmerman argues. Because of the pervasive social and educational role played by the mosque in most Muslim countries, the duty to hate Jews is often presented as the verdict of Allah himself, as delivered in the Qu'ran.

Much of this anti-Semitism is directed at an imaginary Jewish conspiracy to control the world, as outlined in the fraudulent and long discredited Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

Scapegoating, ignorance, underdevelopment, poverty: all have been used as excuses for the visceral hatred of Jews and America now rampant throughout the Arab and Muslim world. Yet just as with Nazi Germany, these explanations fall wide of the mark. Writes Timmerman: "It was not because of racism that Nazis hated Jews, but because of their hatred of Jews that the Nazis utilized racist arguments. The Jew-hatred comes first… It was, like all other forms of anti-Semitism, hatred of the challenges posed by Jews and Jewish values."

With today's anti-Semites and anti-American fanatics, nothing has changed. The hatred and the rejection of others come first; the rationale can always be invented later.

No fantasy is too bizarre. No falsehood too grotesque. Timmerman shows that after presenting the blood libel as fact, Egypt's Al-Abram newspaper concludes: "The bestial drive to knead Passover matzahs with the blood of non-Jews is [confirmed] in the records of the Palestinian police where there are many recorded cases of the bodies of Arab children who had disappeared being found torn to pieces without a single drop of blood. The most reasonable explanation is that the blood was taken to be kneaded into the dough of extremist Jews to be used in matzahs to be devoured during Passover."

Timmerman, who is not a Jew and who objects violently to the accusation, insists it is vitally important that Americans of all backgrounds understand that much of today's anti-Semitism, while aimed at Jews, stems from a belief system that equally rejects America and western civilization as a whole. When Jews are killed in Jerusalem, or synagogues are attacked in Britain and France, Americans in New York, Philadelphia and Chicago become more vulnerable.

"Jews are like the canary that miners take down into the pits to warn them when they are about to die. Jews get attacked first, when the enemies of America can't attack Americans, but make no mistake: we're next. It begins with the Jews, but it never ends with the Jews."

The author's approach at times seems shrill and perhaps hyperbolic, but any realistic attempt to bring security and democracy to the Middle East or peace between Jews and Arabs must take into account the deep-seated virulent hatred in Islam.

Jewish Life

Jewish business ethics

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The (secular) new year has begun. Are you planning to cheat on your taxes this year? Or take soap and shampoo home from a hotel room? Or slam the phone down on a telemarketer? Or download MP3s?

You may not think the Gemarah has much to say about copying MP3s, but you'd be surprised. Contemporary rabbis and other Jewish thinkers have studied the "thou shalts" and "thou shalt nots" found in the Torah, Talmud and traditional sources and have applied them to ethical dilemmas of modern-day life. As always, if you have a problem, read up on the Internet, but consult a trusted authority who knows you and the details of your difficulty.

Before getting to the answers, the Business Ethics Center of Jerusalem explains how Judaism views wealth, poverty and greed. Judaism recognizes that self-interest plays a major – but not the only – role in ensuring ethical standards (for example, "Do not do unto others as you would not like done to yourself"). The site also points out that unlike other traditions, Judaism has never viewed poverty as a virtue. Wealth, however, has always been seen as a challenge. Judaism places many social and charitable responsibilities on the financially stronger elements within society and emphasizes the need to prevent exploitation of the weak. And greed, while being an important motivation for economic activity, is also a source for unethical behaviour [www.jewishethicist.com/].

OK, but what about that unwanted telemarketer? Rabbi Asher Meir seems well-positioned to respond. The director of the Jerusalem College of Technology's Center for Business Ethics, who received his PhD at MIT, suggests that telemarketers wouldn't have fazed the rabbis of the Talmud. The rabbis recognized that door-to-door salesmen provided a valuable service. "Other passages show that the rabbis recognized the peddler's potential for mischief." Rabbi Meir reminds us "that everyone has to make a living, and this includes salespeople. Ask yourself how you would want to be treated by prospects if you were in this line of work." He recommends a polite thanks but no thanks. The Jewish Ethicist website has dozens of other intriguing ethical questions and answers in its archive [www.besr.org/ethicist/archive.html].

Here's another question from Torah.org's Business Halacha website. If you pay for something by cheque and realize after a few months that it hasn't been cashed, should you inform the seller? The site suggests that you do not have to inform the seller. Check out the site for the reasons and for many other scenarios [www.torah.org/advanced/business-halacha/5757/].

The Jewish Association for Business Ethics looks at contemporary issues such as whistleblowing, when a gift becomes a bribe and whether you can trash your competition [www.jabe.org/]. Darche Noam Institutions has links to articles on everything from debt collection to the treatment of dismissed employees to halachic models for copyright protection [www.darchenoam.org/ethics/pe_home.htm]. And for something novel, visit JewishBusiness.com. Part ethics site, part commercial venture, it attempts to "fuse commercialism with education; materialism with religion and spiritualism" [www.jewishbusiness.com/].

Of course, Jewish ethics and moral instruction are nothing new. From the biblical prophets to the 19th century Mussar Movement to more recently, Jews have examined ways of applying moral instructions to their everyday lives. You can read an overview at the Wikipidia online encyclopedia [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jewish_ethics].

Now that you have studied the basics, where do you stand? In the Jewish Ethics Challenge, Rabbi Arthur Gross Schaefer, a business law and ethics professor, poses several questions [www.uahc.org/rjmag/1197ag.html]. For example, "You are a member of a Temple board which is debating the need to renovate the main Temple bathroom to accommodate people with disabilities. There is not enough money in the Temple's building fund to pay for the work and get the permit. Therefore, most of the board members want to proceed with the renovation without the permit." What should you do?

Schaefer doesn't supply the "right" answer. Rather, he says, "Jewish tradition has always demanded good citizenship, which requires following fair laws and showing regard for the decision-making process of the community in which we live… However, this does not demand blind obedience to the community's laws where they are in conflict with other ethical values."

And then the choice is up to you.

The donning of tfillin

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

The way we have been performing the mitzvah of tfillin for the past couple of thousand years, which is to don them in the morning while saying a prayer, is not exactly the way we were instructed in the Torah. Nor is it the manner in which this mitzvah was originally carried out.

When the Torah told us to bind the tfillin as a sign, it meant that all males were to wear their tfillin throughout the entire day, in the same way as one wears his tzizit all day long, today.

This was the practice in ancient Israel: a man would wake up and wear his tfillin for virtually the full course of the day. He was to be aware throughout his daily activities of the fact that he was wearing these tfillin, removing them only for mealtimes and for any other activities deemed inconsistent with the sanctity of the tfillin.

For various reasons, including our diminished powers of focus and consciousness, as well as the inevitable encounter with a non-Jewish world, this practice went into disuse and developed into the present observance of tfillin, limited to what we are used to – wearing them only for the course of the morning prayers.

Jewish mysticism – the Kabbalah – placed the utmost importance on the requirement that one at least wear his tfillin to go from his home to his place of worship. If one was unable to wear his tfillin throughout the course of the day, let him at least leave his home wearing them in the street and until the end of morning services. This too was difficult to accomplish. Today, only a very few individuals, and perhaps only in Israel, carry on with this mitzvah as it was commanded.

This all came to my mind recently as we celebrated my son's bar mitzvah. Allow me to correct myself, as the Sephardim do not generally refer to the life cycle event of coming of age at 13 as becoming "bar mitzvah," but rather as "donning tfillin," as in: "Did he have his tfillin on yet?" instead of "Did he have his bar mitzvah yet?" It is on this day, the day he comes of age, that the young man expresses his Jewishness by donning his tfillin for the first time.

Perhaps in recognition of the way this mitzvah was originally observed, the Sephardi custom is that on this day, the boy begins the morning at his home, surrounded by his immediate male relatives. Here his uncles, cousins, grandfathers and father gather to take part in placing the leathers of the tfillin on the young man, one person wrapping at a time. After this, the young man is escorted to the synagogue with candles, song and dance. The women of the family participate by showering him with sweets. (And nowadays, as well, by taking lots of pictures!)

In this fashion, they make their way to the synagogue for the first time, as an older times, publicly and proudly wearing tfillin.

Jews' commitment to Winnipeg 'unmatched:' new federation president

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The pride Neil Duboff has in being a Jewish Winnipegger is evident when he talks about becoming the head of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal.

"This is a tremendous, exciting and united community," said Duboff, who was elected president last month for a two-year term.

"I think our community can serve as a role model for other ethnic communities in Winnipeg, as well as other Jewish communities across the country. The commitment of our people to our city is unmatched.

"Our community is small enough that we all know each other and are friends. Yet, at the same time, we are able to support the kinds of facilities that are more often found in larger cities."

Duboff, a lifelong resident of the city, is a commercial lawyer with the firm Duboff Edwards Haight and Schachter. He was called to the bar in 1985 and specializes in corporate structuring, acquisitions and financing, transportation law and aboriginal issues.

He said he has always recognized the importance of community involvement.

"I feel that we have an obligation to give back to the community as much as we can, in appreciation for the freedom, privilege and culture we enjoy [in Canada and in Winnipeg]."

Duboff was introduced to community involvement in 1985 by Joel Dudeck, the principal in the firm he was with at the time, who invited him to join the board of the Jewish Child and Family Service.

"I developed a real passion for the work of the JCFS and for the community as a whole," Duboff said.

He went on to serve as president of the JCFS, as well as on almost every other board in the Jewish community.

Duboff's resumé includes stints on the Board of Jewish Education, the old YMHA, the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, State of Israel Bonds, the United Israel Appeal and the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, as well as the federation.

Nationally, he has served on the Canada-Israel Committee and Canadian Jewish Congress, and he has also been involved in the New York-based Association of Jewish Child and Family Services.

In the wider community, he has volunteered with a number of cultural, educational and legal institutions, and he has been active in the provincial Liberal Party. (One of his law partners, Paul Edwards, is a former party leader.)

Duboff is becoming federation president at a time when the outlook for the Jewish community here is improving. For the first time in years, the population may be on the increase, thanks to a fairly large-scale immigration of Argentine Jewish families, augmented by Russian families coming in larger numbers from Israel.

Duboff said as many as 1,000 new people have joined the community in the past three years.

"Demographically, they're the kind of people we are looking for: young families who are happy to be here and eager to be part of the community," he said, referring to one aspect of the community's Grow Winnipeg program, whose goal is to increase the size of the Winnipeg Jewish community by more than 3,000 to about 18,000 people.

Besides immigration, there are two other prongs to the program – retaining young people and encouraging former Winnipeggers to come back home.

The greatest challenge, Duboff said, "is making sure there are good jobs waiting for them."

The new president said he will also continue to reach out to the non-Jewish world – particularly politicians and business leaders – to build a strong case for their support of a democratic Israel. As well, he hopes to foster a closer relationship between the federation and elements of the Jewish community who are not currently its beneficiaries.

"I also want to draw attention to the fact that there are thriving Jewish communities outside of Toronto and Montreal that remain an important part of the Canadian Jewish fabric," he said.

"Too often, the smaller communities tend to be overlooked."

In Winnipeg's Jewish community, "we respect our differences and recognize everyone's contributions," Duboff said.

"We all work well together. We want to continue to be able to help the weak and the poor in the community. That means we have to have people feeling good about the community and about being Jews."

Duboff's wife of 24 years, Carol, is also active in the federation, as well as in ORT. The couple have three children.

CORRECTIONS

In the article "USYers socialize and tackle issues at convention," it was noted that two Canadians were elected to the international executive and that this was believed to be a first, but there were in fact two Canadians elected to the international board in 1994: Aaron Levinoff and Tamara Kochberg, who is now regional youth director of Eastern Canadian region USY.

Government contests refugee status for Israeli rabbi

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The federal government is seeking to appeal the granting of refugee status to a chassidic rabbi, a convicted felon in the United States who claims he will be in danger if he returns to Israel.

Citizenship and Immigration Canada applied in December for a judicial review by the Federal Court of the case of Erez Shlomo Elbarnes, 41, who lives in Ste. Agathe. In its request, the department asks that the decision made by Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) arbitrator Gilles Ethier be quashed and that a new hearing be ordered before another commissioner of the IRB's refugee section.

Elbarnes, whose name has appeared publicly in the past as Helbrans, was convicted of kidnapping in 1994 by a Brooklyn, N.Y., court in a sensational case that was reported widely in the United States.

The bizarre story of how Elbarnes, who ran a yeshiva in New York, held a boy for two years after he was brought to him by his mother for bar mitzvah instruction when he was 13, became the basis of a book, The Zaddik: The Battle for a Boy's Soul by Elaine Grudin Denholtz, published in 2001.

Elbarnes testified that he had given sanctuary to a boy from a troubled home, and believed the boy was destined to become a tzaddik. The boy himself claimed that he had stayed willingly with the small religious group, which moved about between the United States, France and Israel, but his parents accused Elbarnes of having brainwashed him. Years later, as an adult, Shai Fhima Reuven, maintained he had not been abducted.

Elbarnes served two years of a sentence of up to 12 years before having his sentenced reduced and being paroled in 1996.

In 2000, while still appealing the kidnapping conviction, Elbarnes and his wife Malka, who had been convicted separately on lesser charges, were deported to Israel, where Elbarnes was born and lived until he came to the United States in 1990.

> Claims life would be in danger if returned to Israel

At the time of his deportation, the Jerusalem Post, citing a New York Times report, quoted U.S. immigration officials as saying Elbarnes had been deported because he had entered the United States illegally and that convicted felons can be deported.

In an interview that appeared in Saturday Night magazine in October, Elbarnes (as Helbrans) is quoted as saying he came to Canada on a temporary visa and was applying for refugee status. He said he would be harmed if sent back to Israel.

Although Elbarnes did not return a message last week from The CJN, he told the newspaper in November that he was the leader of a religious community of about 30 families, which was established two years earlier in Ste. Agathe, a Laurentian town of about 10,000. The community is building a synagogue there.

The CJN met him at Concordia University during a panel discussion on alternative solutions to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. From the audience, he spoke out vigorously in favour of the dismantling of the Jewish state. He also distributed leaflets from the notoriously anti-Israel Neturei Karta chassidic sect, based in Monsey, N.Y., where Elbarnes had lived.

Elbarnes is aggressively anti-Zionist, and founded a sect called Hisachdus Hayereim, which roughly means Union of the God-Fearing. He has not kept a low profile since arriving here; on one Yom Ha'atzmaut, he held a public burning of the Israeli flag.

Ethier ruled in favour of Elbarnes' refugee claim from the bench on Oct. 29 and issued a written judgment on Nov. 20.

Elbarnes' lawyer Julius Grey, a prominent human rights jurist, has filed his client's intention to respond to the application for leave. At The CJN's deadline last week, Grey was in court and unavailable for comment.

Citizenship and Immigration cites grounds of a very general nature for seeking a review of the decision by the IRB panel, basically that the tribunal "did not observe the principle of natural justice or procedural equity or all other procedure that it was legally required to respect… [and] rendered a decision marred by an error in law…"

Robert Gervais, the department's Quebec spokesperson, confirmed it is not common for the Citizenship and Immigration to appeal IRB decisions that uphold claims. He said he could not comment further on the case, but he was familiar with Elbarnes' past.

"The ministry does not appeal unless there are good reasons… I expect those reasons will be submitted in time, possibly orally before a judge. At this point, I can't give any more information than has been given to the courts."

Officially, Citizenship and Immigration is the "client" of the Justice Department in this case, he said. The request for a review was filed by deputy justice minister Morris Rosenberg.

Elbarnes' early parole led to a federal investigation into whether New York state officials had been improperly influenced by a politically connected group of chassidim who supported Governor George Pataki.

On Nov. 24, the Albany, N. Y., Times-Union reported that the inquiry appears to have gone nowhere. In a story on its website, the newspaper reports: "As of 1998, the U.S. attorney was pursuing those allegations, but there is no evidence that the inquiry is ongoing. The U.S. attorney's records on the inquiry are confidential, lawyers close to the case say."

Editor defends publication of anti-Semitic article

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The editor of a B.C. Muslim newspaper is citing freedom of speech in defending his decision to publish an anti-Semitic article that has led the B.C. Hate Crimes Unit to open an investigation.

The piece in the Dec. 19 edition of The Miracle by Idaho resident Edgar J. Steele, who is known in the United States for his racist views, accuses Jews of more than 80 alleged misdeeds, such as faking the Holocaust, starting both world wars, staging the Sept. 11 terror attacks, running U.S. organized crime, assassinating former U.S. president John. F. Kennedy, causing the Great Depression and crucifying Jesus.

Chief editor Nusrat Hussain said Steele's article, titled "It Wasn't Arabs," doesn't represent his own views about Jews.

"I don't agree with it at all, but I also believe in freedom of speech," he said, adding that "about a year ago" he wrote an editorial condemning the Holocaust.

Hussain, who has refused to apologize for the article, told CBC he's been getting harassing phone calls since publishing it and is offering space in the paper to anyone wishing to respond.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, is seeking a criminal investigation into what it calls "a virulently anti-Semitic article," and copies of the paper have been given to the provincial hate crimes unit.

CJC also said it is examining back issues to see if the paper has published other anti-Jewish articles in the past.

The Miracle, which is published weekly in Delta, B.C., and distributed in Lower Mainland mosques, has a total readership of about 10,000, Hussain said.

The paper's editorial page says the newspaper is dedicated to Islamic brotherhood and bringing "harmony amongst all Muslim and other communities." The paper also includes a disclaimer that "articles do not necessarily reflect the views and opinions of The Miracle."

Other accusations against Jews made by Steele range from pedophilia and organized crime to "race-mixing" and "forcing us to allow homosexuals to lead Boy Scout troops."

Steele's article appears on page 12 of the Dec. 19 issue. It can be read by going to www.miraclenews.com. The latest edition of The Miracle (number 83) claims the capture of Saddam Hussein was a hoax.

B.C. Liberal Senator Mobina Jaffer, a Muslim, who has written four or five columns in The Miracle in the past year, including one in the Dec. 19 issue, said Steele's article "made me sick," the Vancouver Sun reported. Mobina said she will no longer write for the paper because of the publication of Steele's piece and Hussain's defence of it, adding that there are boundaries to free speech.

Mobina, who has been holding meetings in Canada between Israeli and Palestinian women, had intended to write a series of articles on how Canada can work for Mideast peace. She is heading to Israel later this month.

In a statement, CJC said the Southern Poverty Law Center, a U.S. civil rights organization that tracks hate groups and fights them in the courts, identified Steele in its fall 2003 Intelligence Report as an anti-Semite and anti-black racist, and included him in its list of top-40 extremists.

CJC president Keith Landy said, "It is appalling to see that a Canadian newspaper would even consider printing an article by Mr. Steele, whose earlier works include 'In Defence of Racism,' a venomous piece on the purported intellectual inferiority of black people and their 'propensity for violence and primal satisfaction,' and 'It's the Jews, Stupid,' a particularly noxious treatise blaming the Jews for all things nefarious past, present and future."

CJC Pacific region chair Nisson Goldman said, "We are truly disgusted to see this racist trash appearing in a local newspaper that claims to cater to a particular faith community. This article trots out all of the typical anti-Semitic lies familiar to Nazis and white supremacists and invents a few more."

CJC Pacific region executive director Erwin Nest said CJC has had a good relationship with the B.C. Muslim community, citing co-operation on the Committee for Racial Justice, the Vancouver Multicultural Society, the Affiliation of Multicultural Societies and Service Agencies of B.C. and a special forum on Muslim-Jewish relations in 2003.

Children of divorced parents travelling to Israel

Estranged parents sometimes attempt to prevent their former spouses from taking their children to Israel on vacation. For those who share the CBC/CNN view of the Jewish state (nothing but violence and no life to speak of), their fears are well-grounded.

This view is held by many, even though tourists have rarely (though tragically) come in harm's way. However, more than often such estranged spouses vindictively bring the "Israel is dangerous" argument before the Courts in attempting to obtain Court orders to prevent such vacations from taking place. Many do so to "punish" their ex-spouses and their extended Israeli families for the slights occasioned during the marriage, or to use as a "bargaining chip" when negotiating a separation agreement.

Children deprived of Israel trip by spousal ill will

Any uncooperative spouse can nip such a trip in the bud simply by refusing to provide written consent to it. How do I know? In many of the cases I have handled, the complaining spouse willingly frequented Israel with the very same children prior to the marital breakdown. Yet once the parties were separated, Israel suddenly became too dangerous for these same children to visit, especially if they were to visit their Israeli relatives.

Fortunately, in June 2002, in a case called K. v. K., the Ontario Court of Appeal ruled against a parent who claimed it was too dangerous to allow his children to travel to Israel during the height of the intifada. The Court ruled that notwithstanding travel advisories issued by the Canadian government about travelling in certain parts of Israel, Gaza and the West Bank, it was in the best interests of the children of that family to visit an ailing relative in Israel, so long as they avoided crowded and other areas which, at the time, had suffered terrorist attacks. At the time, these areas included the Old City part of Jerusalem and Netanya, as well as Gaza and the West Bank.

In a similar recent ruling of December 2003, Madame Justice Magda of the Newmarket Family Court ruled in Ka. v. Ka. that the children could visit relatives with one of their parents in Israel during Hanukkah, which the Judge called the holiday which celebrates the "miracle of the Temple." Her reasoning could well have been written by the Israeli Minister of Tourism, and I quote it in full:

> "Unfortunately all people in Israel are subject to this danger and have been for many years. They take precautions for their children and themselves to avoid places and locations where the risks of harm are greatest. They strive to live a normal and peaceful life as they have for generations. As indicated the respondent's material which I have reviewed in detail does not convince me that there is a greater danger currently than there has been in the recent past. Most of the respondent's material focuses on the consequences of the acts of terror and travel warnings, which are subject to interpretation in different ways. In my view there is no travel ban to Israel per se. The warnings suggest that people not travel to the West Bank and Gaza and the [applicant] has certainly no plans to travel there."

As a community, we should admire the sophistication of our family Courts and their sensitivity to the complex situation in Israel. In these two decisions — and in positive rulings in which our Courts have returned Israeli children who have been wrongfully removed from Israel — our justice system works. The Canadian family Courts have consistently refused to make decisions based solely upon news media generally biased against life in Israel and the negative travel advisories of the Canadian government.

Doctor makes fantasy writing look easy

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — He makes it seem so easy.

Family physician Dr. Michael Schweitzer jogs for about an hour and a half daily in good weather and eureka – a fantasy novel is born.

Schweitzer writes in his head while jogging. The next morning, he types up his notes.

Schweitzer began writing his first book in March 2002 and completed the first draft that June. Several months later, he completed the final draft.

The novel, called The Curse of Garnel Ironheart and published by Manor House, is Schweitzer's first book in a trilogy for teens and adults. The story is filled with epic battles, soul-searching dilemmas and moral quandaries.

The novel brings together two groups of misfits on a quest to retrieve three ancient magical objects. A hidden agenda is gradually revealed and the characters discover they are pawns in an evil bid for power.

Schweitzer, who has a busy family practice in Stoney Creek, says he wanted to write a book since he was a teenager, but time was always an issue.

"There was no time in medical school. Writing was one of those things that got put on the back burner. Now I have a routine and I have the opportunity to write," he said in an interview.

"Finding the time is a matter of prioritizing, organizing your day, knowing what you're doing and when you're doing it and not wasting time between activities. It's amazing how much time just appears when you do that."

"When I exercise, my mind runs. I think of an idea, put the scenes together and write the book in my head. When I hit the keyboard the next morning, I don't have to think. It flows out. I know what I want to type and I type very fast."

He was determined to complete the book, he said.

"I decided this was going to get done. It became part of my daily routine. I'd get to the office at 8 a.m. and type before seeing my patients at 9:30."

Schweitzer also credited technology with his ability to write quickly.

Schweitzer decided to write a fantasy novel because he is a fantasy fan.

"I've always liked fantasy. I've always liked the possibilities. Fantasy is the way we wish the past to be. If dragons existed in the past, there is the possibility of them being out there now. That would make our lives a lot more exciting."

One of Schweitzer's favourite authors is J.R.R. Tolkien, whom he calls the "grandfather" of fantasy. The recent success of the Lord of the Rings movies, based on Tolkien's trilogy, has introduced the fantasy genre to a new audience, he said.

"People are realizing these are inspiring stories. Any theme presented in a modern-day story can be in fantasy, from oppression to freedom to philosophy.

"Everything is basically a variation on Tolkien. Fantasy writers aren't going to amaze anybody with magic or with great monsters. It's been done. What you need to do is work within the genre and focus on developing the characters and the story."

The Curse of Garnel Ironheart is fantasy with a Jewish twist.

"There is a strong Jewish presence in the book. The language of magic is Hebrew, and there are Hebrew names and words," Schweitzer said.

"There is a lot of Jewish philosophy, including a conversation about why a God who is good could create evil."

He said he also has made a point of including strong female characters that are often missing from traditional fantasy novels.

In addition to his writing and medical practice, Schweitzer is active at Adas Israel Synagogue and is a member of the local chevrah kadishah. He and his wife Adalia have two young children, Shlomo-Eli and Rena.

Montrealer returns to tell Ethiopian Jewish story

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Motivational speaker Lynn Hazan is a storyteller who makes tales come alive for people around the world.

One of the stories the Montreal native is telling these days is about the dire situation of the 20,000 remaining Jews of Ethiopia.

Known as the Falash Mura, these Jews are slowly succumbing to malaria and starvation.

Hazan was a member of a delegation of North American Jews who spent a week in Ethiopia a year ago on a mission organized by the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry (NACOEJ), the only Jewish organization fighting to help the last Jews of Ethiopia to survive and reach Israel.

As a result of her trip, Hazan became an advocate for Ethiopian Jews, which in turn led to her being named Jewish Chicagoan of 2003 by the Chicago Jewish News.

Hazan, 48, who has lived in Chicago for more than two decades and runs her own corporate headhunting firm there, returned to Montreal recently to speak at Beth El Synagogue, where she once worked as youth director.

The McGill University graduate, who has a master's degree in Jewish communal services in Brandeis University, is animated and passionate as she talks about working for Jewish causes and telling other people's tales.

"In a way, I've been doing this since I was a kid," Hazan said in an interview. "I always told stories, even as a nine-year-old.

"And they were always stories that lent themselves to audience participation. I had one of those 'eureka' moments where I realized that my love for public speaking and dramatic flair gave me an ability to connect with people."

Her trip to Addis Ababa and Gondar made a lasting impression on Hazan, who saw poverty and profound undernourishment mingling with joyous Jewish spirit and commitment; a developed infrastructure of schools but only crowded mud huts for housing; and artistic craftsmanship and embroidery, skills Ethiopian Jews developed because they were restricted to these lowly trades.

Hazan spoke of an NACOEJ program that twins Ethiopian kids of bar- and bat mitzvah age with peers in North America. She also spoke of a nonsectarian program that gives Ethiopian children circus skill training. The project, which began at NACOEJ, has spread throughout the country, empowering kids with self-esteem.

Hazan brought several examples of religious artifacts made by Ethiopian Jews, such as tallit bags and challah covers.

She struggled to contain her emotion as she recalled poor children singing Hatikvah with bright eyes.

"In the midst of all this despair, this devastating poverty, you see these signs of life, and hope and vitality," she said. "You try, as much as you can, to bring them tools that can empower them, to give them a sense of control over their own destiny."

The issue of Ethiopian Jews continues to be very controversial in Israel, which so far has not brought over the remaining Jews, Hazan said, adding that she advocates wherever she can on the issue.

This past summer, she became involved in the U.S.-based Coalition for Advancement of Jewish Education (CAGE), and used a CAGE conference to distribute photos of Ethiopian children to North American supporters.

"These photos become powerful learning tools," she says.

Hazan has travelled throughout the United States, as well as to Mexico, Israel and Ukraine, where she worked with Project Kesher, a grassroots organization that renews Jewish life and provides resources for women in the former Soviet Union. She's also planning a trip to Germany, where there has been a revival of Jewish life due to a large influx of Jews from the FSU.

Her activism comes in part from being the child of immigrants and identifying with their struggles, she said.

But it also comes from her desire to empower people through her storytelling and advocacy work.

"It's some of the most satisfying work I've ever done," she said. "To give people ways to communicate and to be involved, that's important to me, to have a significant impact Jewishly and otherwise."

Israel just part of the story as Mideast opens up

The early part of January was marked in the Canadian media, and indeed in much of the Western media, by relatively little attention to Israel. This fact alone tells us a lot about developments in the region.

Since the U.S.-led attacks on Afghanistan and Iraq, foreign correspondents have had more access to these countries than ever before. The camera's lens has been opened onto the region as a whole and is recording new stories, especially in Iraq, where Saddam Hussein's capture is causing major shake-ups from the Persian Gulf to the Maghreb.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

This is not to say that the media's traditional preoccupation (in certain cases obsession) with Israel – especially with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict – has been totally eclipsed. Stories from Israel are rarely off the radar screen for long, and the growing controversy over Israel's security fence, as it makes its way to the International Court of Justice in the Hague, promises to attract substantial attention in the near future.

However, journalists – both correspondents in the field and their editors back home in the West – are realizing that Mideast history is on the move in ways that most did not anticipate only months ago.

Many correspondents ordinarily based in Israel are spending more time as "Middle East" reporters. They are filing reports from Iran – even prior to the earthquake in Bam – as well as from Iraq, Afghanistan, Egypt and Libya, where mercurial leader Moammar Gadhafi has announced plans to dismantle his weapons of mass destruction program. In yet another surprising move, this week it was confirmed that Gadhafi's son and officials in his regime have also met twice with Israeli officials and Knesset members.

Syria's leader Bashar Assad is sending out what some interpret as peace signals and what many analysts see as an attempt to end his political and economic isolation. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak is trying to broker a new ceasefire among the Palestinian factions and interest is beginning to be raised about whether he is grooming his son as his successor.

Saudi Arabia – cognizant of the need for reform – is showing tentative signs of "playing ball" in the newly evolving regional climate. This is one explanation for the kingdom's substantial advertising supplement in a November issue of the New Republic, one of the most pro-Israeli weekly publications in the United States.

Samuel Segev, who has been writing about these regional changes in the Winnipeg Free Press, said in a recent telephone conversation that one of the most important – but least reported – developments is Jordan's role, under U.S. contract. in training Iraqi police, soldiers and intelligence personnel. Jordan is also teaching Arabic to U.S. forces stationed there.

Some journalists are weary of the "same-old, same-old" story in Israel. While Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat remains in charge of PA security services, the essential road map condition that the Palestinian terrorist organizations be disarmed and dismantled cannot be fulfilled. Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia will therefore remain without any enforcement powers – in short, ineffective. And since Arafat has indicated by his actions, as opposed to his verbal declarations, that he's not interested in establishing a Palestinian state alongside Israel, there can, almost by definition, be no real progress on the Israeli-Palestinian front.

So, although Israel will always be the site of important news, the real short-term changes in the Middle East – and, therefore, some of the hot stories – will be occurring elsewhere. This means that media attention will, appropriately, be focused on other countries in the region, and Israel, at least for now, will get the coverage that it proportionately warrants.

FUNDRAISING AT LEO BAECK:

Leo Baeck student council president Max Stiss holds a beautiful plaque acknowledging the students' fundraising at both Leo Baeck campuses for the Yoseftal Hospital in Eilat. The students raised over $10,000 to purchase television sets for the patients, especially children, to provide distraction from their pain during their stay in the hospital. The Leo Baeck students were part of a community-wide effort of UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 and an initiative identified by teachers who visited Israel last summer.

Honey הוא סרט שמביא את סיפורה של רקדנית כושית שעולה כמו מטאור, אך אינה שוכחת מחיכן היא באה, וממשיכה לדאוג לילדי הרחוב של ניו יורק. הריקודים מדהימים, ואירוח נהדרת ואופטימית מכסה עם אבקת סוכר על מגרעותיה של עלילה קצת נאיבית. שמונה בסולם קורן, אבל כף אמיתי.
הרבות המאיה
אופה הן עכשיו

Non-Jewish Canadian airmen interned at Buchenwald

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — In the early morning hours of June 8, 1944, Royal Canadian Air Force flyer Ed Carter-Edwards made the worst decision of his life.

He decided to turn right instead of left, at a fork in a path.

Carter-Edwards followed a route that eventually led to a 3½-month internment in Buchenwald Concentration Camp near Weimar, Germany, where more than 43,000 prisoners died.

Carter-Edwards was one of 168 Allied airmen who endured horrific emotional and physical pain at Buchenwald. But years later they had difficulty convincing people they had been there.

The Geneva Convention dictated that captured military personnel were to be sent to prisoner of war camps.

"People wouldn't believe us," Carter-Edwards said in a recent interview. "We had to hold this whole thing in our minds and hearts for years and years."

It wasn't until the mid-1980s, at a PoW reunion, that Carter-Edwards connected with two other airmen who had been at Buchenwald. After that meeting, the men sent letters to veterans' organizations and gradually located other airmen who had suffered the same fate.

In 1993, Carter-Edwards approached the National Film Board of Canada about producing a film about the experiences of the Allied airmen. The Lucky Ones: Allied Airmen and Buchenwald was broadcast on CBC television in 1994.

Carter-Edwards is 80 now, and lives with his wife Lois in Smithville, Ont. Determined to educate people about the horrors of the Holocaust, he speaks to schools and other groups in the Hamilton area, telling the story of the 168 Allied airmen, 26 of them Canadians, who were incarcerated in Buchenwald.

"The reason that I speak to these groups is because 99.9 per cent of Canadian people are totally unaware that 26 Canadian citizens were involved in a concentration camp experience."

As a non-Jew and a former RCAF flyer, Carter-Edwards hopes to convince skeptics about the reality of the Holocaust.

"I feel like kind of an ambassador. I say, if you don't want to believe the Jewish people, then believe me. Concentration camps did exist. They were cruel, barbaric and sadistic."

Carter-Edwards was 19 when he joined the RCAF in August 1942. After training as a wireless operator, he was shipped to England to become part of a seven-member crew on the Halifax bomber.

The object of their 22nd trip was to bomb a railway yard in the town of Achères, France. Before the mission was completed, a German night fighter bombed the Halifax and the crew had to bale out in parachutes.

When Carter-Edwards hit the ground, he was relieved to find a member of his crew. Together they ran blindly though the dark until they came to a fork in a path and they were separated. Thinking the man had turned right, Carter-Edwards went in that direction.

Years after the war ended, the two were reunited, and the airman told Carter-Edwards that he had turned left, was picked up by the French underground and was safely hidden until he was liberated in August 1944.

The French underground also hid Carter-Edwards, who over the next few weeks was provided with a French passport and civilian clothing. However, Carter-Edwards and 167 other airmen didn't make it to safety because a German collaborator betrayed them.

Carter-Edwards joined three other airmen in a car ostensibly heading for Spain, but just outside of Paris, the car was stopped at a roadblock. German soldiers threw them out of the car and viciously beat them.

"I opened up my shirt to reveal my dog tags identifying me as a Canadian airman. A German officer ripped them off and threw them away.

"'You're not airmen,' he yelled.

"'You're all spies and saboteurs and you're going to be executed.'"

The airmen were sent to Fresnes, a Paris prison run by the Gestapo. They were beaten and threatened with execution.

Carter-Edwards recalled many nights listening to the screams of prisoners who were being tortured. The only way he and the other airmen could keep their sanity was to make a game of counting the number of fleas in their clothes.

In mid-August 1944, Fresnes was evacuated. The prisoners were forced into train boxcars, and days later, they arrived in Buchenwald.

"There was a horrible stench and black smoke coming from a tall chimney on a building that we later learned was the crematorium. We could see thousands and thousands of walking skeletons. As we got closer, we heard people muttering the word Buchenwald."

The airmen were forced to be slave labourers, he said, and subjected to the same horrific living conditions as the civilian prisoners.

Food was limited. The meagre rations included a watery vegetable soup with floating maggots, fleas and lice. Each of the airmen lost up to 40 pounds during his internment there.

Forced to sleep outside on a cobblestone road for several weeks, Carter-Edwards became sick with pneumonia and pleurisy. He was sent to the infirmary, which he described as simply a hut for the dead and dying. He survived because a French doctor, a member of the underground, came to his aid and sucked fluid from his lungs with a syringe.

Carter-Edwards saw dozens of prisoners die each day. He said their skeletons were placed like cordwood on a wooden carrier taken to the crematorium. Among the dead were two of the 168 allied airmen.

During their incarceration at Buchenwald, 32 Allied intelligence operators were executed by hanging from meat hooks in the basement of the crematorium. Orders were given for the airmen to be executed in the same fashion. Miraculously, however, the German Air Force, the Luftwaffe, rescued them from Buchenwald and sent them to a prisoner-of-war camp in Sagan, Poland, called Stalag Luft 3.

In 2001, the German government paid $5,000 to the Canadian airmen, including Ed Carter-Edwards, prisoner 78361, for their work as slave labourers at Buchenwald.

Plenty of reasons to be proud of our students

By TILLIE SHAMES
Special to The CJN

The recent Al-Awda sponsored Palestinian Solidarity Conference at the University of Toronto generated local and national headlines. Members of the press seemed to fall over themselves looking for another "Concordia" to erupt. They tripped. This was certainly not it.

Far from it. In contrast to the violence that stopped former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu from speaking at Montreal's Concordia University in September 2002, the Palestinian Solidarity Conference – which was initially cancelled by the university's Office of Student Affairs and then reinstated by the administration – was tame and uneventful. The organizers themselves admitted to wishing the conference had been cancelled because there was such a lack of interest during the exam period. Yet it was presented as the event of the semester. Without outside interference and media exposure, it would have been a dismal failure.

The National Post went so far as to report that a student newspaper was shut down over the event. Not true. A small student newspaper at U of T's University College, The Gargoyle, was shut down due to an unrelated, anti-Semitic editorial comment published the week before the conference was originally cancelled. Hillel students lodged a complaint and University College shut down the paper while investigating the incident.

Non-campus groups repeatedly tell the public that Jewish students feel threatened and intimidated. There is no question that many of our campuses are being hijacked by the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and a distorted anti-Israel "human rights" agenda. But despite this environment, many students feel a sense of Jewish pride and a drive to become more deeply engaged in Israel affairs. Thousands of students across Canada have returned to campus after a Birthright Israel trip with a love for, and a deeper understanding of, Israel.

To build upon this renewed pride and to change the tide against Israel on campus, Hillel has focused on portraying Israel in a positive light through campaigns that emphasize everything from cultural diversity to Israel's leadership in overseas development assistance. While there is a time for political action, change will not come through protests. If all the campus community sees are students yelling at each other over loudspeakers and writing slanderous letters to the editor, there will be no desire for greater understanding of the conflict. There is a time for action and a time for reaction, but it is all those times in between where our students must see proactive, innovative campaigns that will give them reason to stand up for Israel.

Proactive does not mean building up Israel by putting down the rest of the Middle East. Proactive means focusing on all that Israel offers to the world. Students are becoming active in Israel affairs after being exposed to the country's strengths and its efforts to uphold democratic values despite the ongoing threat of terrorism. Visiting speakers such as Ishmael Khaldi, an Israeli Bedouin, have discussed minority rights in Israel and their experiences lobbying for equality there. The "More Humus, Less Hamas" campaign united students of all faiths in a petition to declare suicide bombings as crimes against humanity. "Peace by Piece" promoted Israel's search for partners in peace among its neighbours, such as Jordan and Egypt.

On Campus

Many positive stories untold

How do we know our proactive campaigns are working? First, because there is a steady increase in the number of Jewish students volunteering for Israel-related activities and applying for Birthright missions. And second, because pro-Palestinian students are on the defensive.

In an attempt to counter our successful "More Humus, Less Hamas" campaign, the Muslim Action Network at York organized its own "More Humus, Less Occupation" program. Perhaps blinded by their anger toward an anti-terrorism campaign, the group exercised poor judgment by making its event a lunch program during Ramadan. As a result of last-minute and insensitive programming, as well as a lack of interest, their counter-event failed.

Similarly, in response to author Irshad Manji's compelling lecture, "Defending Israel is Defending Diversity," the Muslim Students' Association at Ryerson University countered with a last-minute program called "Defending Palestine is Defending Humanity."

Imitation is the greatest form of flattery.

Yet another significant indicator of the success of our campaigns is the fact that the Palestinian Solidarity Conference dedicated an entire afternoon session to considering ways to counter discussion of women's rights, gay rights and minority rights in Israel – in direct response to Hillel's programming about those rights.

In the media's irresponsible search for Jewish-Muslim strife on campus, many positive stories have gone untold. For instance, at York, pro-Palestinian activists from the Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) group talked for hours with Jewish Israel Affairs Committee members in the Hillel lounge after Manji's talk. The SPHR students repeatedly admitted their lack of faith in the Palestinian leadership and their willingness to protest against suicide bombing. This interfaith dialogue went largely unreported by journalists obsessed with looking for another Concordia.

Yes, anti-Zionism is a constant struggle on our campuses. And yes, our universities' student governments and left-leaning organizations have been hijacked by the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and overwhelming expressions of support for the Palestinians.

But Jewish students are beginning to take control. They remain determined to change the perception of Israel on campus, one step at a time. Hillel backed the Jewish-dominated "Progress, not Politics" slate of candidates that recently swept the York Federation of Students election. Jewish students are now confidently asking fellow students of all faiths and colours to sign the "More Humus, Less Hamas" anti-terrorism petition. And Jewish students at U of T and York continue to travel to U of T's Mississauga campus to promote Israel and strengthen the resolve of the campus's small number of Jewish students.

Certainly, there are many reasons to be concerned for our students. But we also have a great cause to be proud of them.

Delicious low-carb meals in minutes

Anyone trying to lose weight is confronted with all sorts of diet books offering advice on how to lose those unwanted pounds. Low-carb diets are all the rage, but are they safe and do they really work?

Linda Gassenheimer, the author of two best-selling low-carbohydrate cookbooks, offers some delicious, sensible, safe solutions for effective weight-loss. Her first book, Low-Carb Meals in Minutes (Bay Books), zoomed to No. 1 at Amazon.com, with over 250,000 copies in print worldwide. She followed it up with a sequel, More Low-Carb Meals in Minutes (over 175,000 in print).

About Food

By NORENE GILLETZ

Gassenheimer explains her diet. "In general, cut back on the amounts of carbohydrates and eat lean proteins, monounsaturated fats (olive and canola oil), high-fibre vegetables, fruits and beans of all kinds. The emphasis is on using vegetables, lean protein and the type of carbohydrates that do not send blood sugar skyrocketing."

Gassenheimer does not recommend zero carbs. They are a very necessary part of a diet and should not be eliminated. Both books recommend an initial stage (Quick Start) with 10 per cent of calories from carbohydrates. The second stage (Which Carbs) provides for the reintroduction of complex carbs at a level of 25 per cent of the calories consumed. Finally, she provides a permanent lifestyle level (Right Carbs) where 40 per cent of the calories come from carbohydrates, 30 per cent from monounsaturated fats (olive or canola oil) and 30 per cent from lean proteins. Each section offers nutritionally well-balanced recipes for breakfast, lunch, dinner and snacks.

She believes this is the best diet for people who are prediabetic or insulin resistant (also called Syndrome X). If you are an apple shape, carry your weight around your middle or have a "beer belly," then it is very likely you are insulin resistant. Her well-balanced approach presents a lifestyle that shows you how to start reintroducing the right carbs without regaining the weight lost.

Gassenheimer worked with two cardiologists, two endocrinologists and several registered dietitians to create her "no-brainer" blueprint for quick, delicious and healthful meals. The shopping lists, helpful hints and countdown are tools to help you have a meal ready in minutes. All of the ingredients can be bought at a local supermarket and each recipe includes a nutritional analysis. She suggests complete meals so that you don't have to worry about what side dishes go with what.

Although her books are not kosher, many of the recipes can be used or adapted by the kosher cook. Her nutritional tips, helpful hints and sensible advice will be helpful to anyone looking for ways to follow a healthy, low-carb diet. Her books not only help you lose weight, but the three-step program helps you keep it off by achieving a permanent, balanced eating lifestyle.

Here is a simple 15-minute dinner from Low-Carb Meals in Minutes. You can use this as a blueprint to make other similar dinners. Boneless, skinless chicken breasts can be used instead of salmon, cauliflower instead of broccoli, and green beans instead of yellow. Enjoy!

oliye oil spray
¾ pound salmon fillet
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
2 tbsp. low-salt soy sauce
2 tbsp. water
2 tbsp. chopped fresh ginger

Heat a nonstick skillet on medium high and spray with olive oil. Add salmon and brown 2 minutes. Turn, salt and pepper the cooked side, then brown the second side for 2 minutes. Lower heat and saute for 5 minutes. Combine soy sauce, water and ginger in a small bowl. Remove salmon from skillet, add soy sauce mixture to skillet and cook several seconds. Divide salmon between 2 plates and spoon sauce over salmon. Makes 2 servings.

One serving: 310 calories, 43 g protein, 2 g carbohydrate, 12 g fat (3 g saturated), 120 mg cholesterol, 714 mg sodium, 0 g fibre.

SESAME BROCCOLI

¼ pound broccoli florets (2 cups)
2 tsp. olive oil
¼ cup sesame seeds
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste

Place broccoli in a microwave-safe bowl and microwave on high for 5 minutes. Alternatively, bring a pot of water to a boil and add broccoli. Boil 2 minutes, then drain. Heat oil in a nonstick skillet on medium high. Saute broccoli and sesame seeds 3 to 4 minutes, or until sesame seeds are golden and broccoli is bright green, but crisp. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Serve with the salmon. Makes 2 servings.

One serving: 158 calories, 7 g protein, 6 g carbohydrate, 14 g fat (2 g saturated), 0 mg cholesterol, 79 mg sodium, 2 g fibre.

YELLOW BEAN SALAD

½ pound yellow wax beans, trimmed and cut in half (2 cups)
2 tbsp. no-sugar-added olive oil and vinegar dressing
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste

Place beans in a microwave-safe bowl and microwave on high for 3 minutes. Alternatively, bring a pot of water to a boil and add beans. Boil for 2 minutes, then drain. Toss cooked beans with salad dressing. Season with salt and pepper to taste and serve. Makes 2 servings.

One serving: 119 calories, 2 g protein, 10 g carbohydrate, 9 g fat (1 g saturated), 0 mg cholesterol, 79 mg sodium, 2 g fibre.

Helpful Hints:

Broccoli and beans can be microwaved at the same time for 3 minutes on high.

To save washing an extra pan, prepare salmon and cover with foil to keep warm. Use same skillet to saute broccoli.

A washed, ready-to-eat salad can be substituted for one of the vegetables.

To chop fresh ginger quickly, cut it into small cubes and press through a garlic press with large holes. If using a press with small holes, just capture the juice that is squeezed out; it will give enough flavour for the recipe.

Noodling around with ramen recipes

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Ramen noodles, a food staple that originated in China, are tasty, crunchy and simple to use, and add a little zip to any dish.

Kosher ramen noodles come in chicken or beef flavours, but the packet of powdered soup mix is pareve. In the following recipes, you can substitute Chinese egg noodles or angel hair pasta for the ramen noodles.

ALMOST INSTANT CORN CHOWDER

If you use soy or rice milk and omit the cheese, you'll have a hearty pareve soup that can be prepared in less than 10 minutes.

1 (3 oz.) package ramen-style noodles, broken up
1 soup packet from the package
2 cups water
16 oz. can cream-style corn
¼ teaspoon powdered ginger
¼ teaspoon curry powder
¼ teaspoon onion powder
¼ teaspoon garlic powder
½ cup milk or soymilk
½ cup cheddar cheese, grated (optional)
salt and pepper to taste
parsley for garnish (optional)

In a medium saucepan, bring 2 cups of water to a boil. Add the ramen noodles and flavour packet and cook for 5 minutes. Mix in cream-style corn, ginger, curry powder, onion and garlic powder and milk. Heat over medium heat. If using real milk, don't let the soup boil. When all the ingredients are heated through, add the grated cheese and mix until it melts. Salt and pepper to taste. Adjust with more milk if soup is too thick. Garnish with a sprig of parsley. Serves 2. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

RAMEN BROCCOLI SLAW

1 cup sunflower seeds
1 cup chopped onions
2 (3 oz.) packages beef-flavoured ramen noodle soup mix
⅓ cup sugar
½ cup rice wine vinegar
½ cup vegetable oil
one or two drops of sesame oil (optional)
cayenne pepper (a few shakes)

In a large salad bowl, combine the broccoli slaw, sunflower seeds, and chopped onions. Toss gently. In a small bowl, combine the seasoning packets from the 2 packages of beef-flavoured ramen noodles, the sugar, vinegar, and oil. Whisk to combine and then pour dressing over salad and toss to combine. Crumble the noodles over the top and serve. Serves 6. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

RAMEN ROYALE SALAD

2 cups red or green cabbage, shredded
1 cup carrots, shredded
4 green onions, chopped
2 tbsp. sesame seeds
½ cup mandarin orange slices (canned)
2 tbsp. unsalted sunflower seeds, shelled
⅓ cup sugar
⅓ cup oil
½ tsp. mustard powder
salt and pepper to taste
juice from 1 fresh lime
1 ramen seasoning packet
½ cup almonds or pine nuts, slivered
½ cup mozzarella or provolone cheese, grated (optional)

Cook the ramen noodles according to package, but do not add seasoning packet. Drain the noodles and place them in large salad bowl. Add the cabbage, carrots, onions, sesame seeds, orange slices and sunflower seeds and toss to combine. In a mixing bowl combine the sugar, oil, mustard powder, salt, pepper, lime juice and one ramen seasoning packet. Whisk the dressing well and then pour it over the noodle mixture. Just before serving, sprinkle with nuts and cheese if you want to make the salad dairy.

SALMON RAMEN WITH FRESH VEGETABLES

2 (3 oz.) packages pareve ramen noodle soup mix
1 tbsp. butter or margarine
1 onion, finely chopped
1½ cups milk
4 oz. cream cheese, cubed
1 cup carrots, julienned
1 cup zucchini, julienned
2 cans (6.5 oz each) salmon, drained and broken into chunks

Open the packages of ramen soup and remove flavour packets. Melt the butter or margarine in skillet and add the chopped onion. Sauté the onion 2 minutes. Add milk, cream cheese and 1 flavour packet. Cook and stir until mixture is smooth. Do not boil. Add the carrots, zucchini and salmon and simmer for 5 minutes. At the same time, cook the 2 packages of noodles with the seasoning from the remaining flavour packet for 3 minutes. Drain liquid. Add the ramen noodles to the salmon and vegetable mixture. Toss gently and serve immediately. Serves 4.

This latest round of European meetings comes after a high profile audience with Pope John Paul last December, after which the pontiff issued a statement against invoking the name of God to justify the killing of innocents.

Rabbi Cooper said Canada could play a key role in mobilizing international support to create a new category of crime against humanity.

"Canada needs to be outspoken, to send a message to Arab governments regarding the kinds of statements that would be actionable in Canada," he said.

Al Qaeda, the Islamist terrorist group that carried out the 9/11 attacks in the United States, has taken the tactic of suicide bombing to a new level. In recent months, suicide bombers have killed innocent Christian, Hindu and Jewish civilians in diverse locations around the world, and now they have made fellow Muslims targets as well, Rabbi Cooper said.

"We don't see this as a political football, but as standing for Canadian values and taking a more aggressive stance in fighting Al Qaeda."

Rabbi Cooper said Canada, though not a major power, is well-respected around the world. "Canadians have made a long-term investment in propping up the United Nations and other international institutions [such as] the International Criminal Court. Canada is a leader. If Canada stands up and makes statements on crossing the line on incitement and hate, that could have an impact in Tokyo, Germany and France."

The international effort to raise suicide bombings to the status of crimes against humanity is only in its "first stage," the rabbi continued. He said raising the issue at international conferences and forging an international consensus would be the start of a long process to make it part of international law.

Eventually, international legal norms against the promotion of suicide bombings could be used against clerics such as Sheikh Yussef al-Qardawi, an Egyptian based in Qatar who regularly appears on the independent television news network Al-Jazeera, Rabbi Cooper said. The sheikh has issued fatwas supporting suicide bombing – allowing even women to carry out the acts.

> 'Canada needs to be outspoken to send message to Arab gov'ts'

Although last week's meeting with Cotler was merely exploratory, Rabbi Cooper said the SWC would advance its proposal on suicide bombings in a more formal manner to Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham.

Rabbi Cooper said his one-hour meeting with Cotler included a discussion of the war crimes brief, involving both Nazi-era and contemporary suspects.

The two are inseparably linked, he maintained, adding that the numerous layers of review and appeal has made the removal of suspects too difficult.

Cotler could not be reached for comment.

Sleeping soundly & lost 10 lbs.

"My name is Harriette Brown Tabakman. I live in North York with my husband, Zale, and our five children, Daniel, Shoshi, Malka, Tzvi, and Aaron. I have a sleep disorder and was desperate to sleep better. I was always exhausted. I saw a Positive Changes ad in The Canadian Jewish News.

Restless Leg Syndrome (RLS)

RLS is a horrible condition because you can't sleep at night. I have a constant tingling in my feet. The only way to relieve it is to move or jerk my legs. So the whole night I move to stop the tingling sensation which constantly wakes me up. A vicious circle.

I noticed the changes in my sleep patterns in the first couple of weeks after I started my program. I am now able to relax. Even if the tingling is there, I can suppress the urge to move. I sleep comfortably. I now wake up with energy, ready to start the day.

Before hypnosis, I felt a lot of stress before I went to sleep because I knew I'd be up all night. Not any more. Hypnosis has been great to help calm my nerves.

Lost weight too – without trying!

I experienced many other benefits from my hypnosis program. I lost 10 pounds, which I wasn't even trying to do. Before hypnosis I would indulge in chocolate and overeat. With hypnosis my subconscious just acts effortlessly and prevents me from noshing.

Why not give hypnosis and Positive Changes a try? It helped me. It can help you reach your goals too."

Katsav sorry Syria rejected invitation for Assad to visit

By ALUF BENN and GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — President Moshe Katsav expressed regret Monday afternoon that his Syrian counterpart Bashar Assad had rejected an invitation to visit Jerusalem.

"It seems that Assad is not made of the same material as the former Egyptian president, Sadat," Katsav said in reference to Anwar Sadat, who became the first Arab leader to visit Israel when he accepted then-prime minister Menachem Begin's 1977 letter of invitation, initiating the contacts that ultimately led to the signing of a peace treaty between the two states in 1979.

Bashar Assad

Syria said Monday that Katsav's invitation was not a serious response to Syria's calls for peace talks.

"We need a serious response. This is not a serious response. A serious response is to say yes, we are interested in peace, we want to negotiate..." Syria's expatriates minister Buthaina Sha'aban told CNN.

According to Israel Radio, Sha'aban told the BBC on Monday there was no doubt that Assad would reject the offer.

The Prime Minister's Office refused to comment on Katsav's invitation, Israel radio said.

In extending his invitation on Monday morning, Katsav stressed that there were no preconditions attached.

"I'm the president of Israel and I have the authority to invite foreign presidents to come to Israel," Katsav said in an interview with Israel Radio. "I invite the president of Syria to come to Jerusalem to meet with the country's leaders and conduct serious negotiations, if that is his wish.

"There is no doubt that President Assad is in severe trouble, and his intentions aren't pure," Katsav said, "but we must seriously examine his proposal to renew negotiations with Israel in a direct meeting and not through the media."

In early December, Assad told the New York Times he was ready to resume negotiations with Israel where they broke off in 2000 – with Israel offering to return nearly all of the Golan Heights, which were captured from Syria during the 1967 Six Day War.

Katsav also repeated the claim made by security sources last week that Syrian planes flying aid to earthquake-struck Iran have returned with Iranian arms for Hezbollah.

He said Israel is not clear about Syria's opening negotiating position, but if Assad is seriously willing to start talks from "point zero," he should go through diplomatic channels and even invite Israeli leaders to Damascus.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Sunday that Israel would be happy to begin peace talks with Syria, but only if Syria first ends its support for terrorist organizations.

Speaking with foreign correspondents in Jerusalem Sunday, Sharon said, "I believe that what should be done is that Syria should stop the help and support for terrorist agents, and if that happens, I believe Israel will be ready."

Sharon claimed that most Syrian assistance for terrorist organizations goes through Lebanon, which has been "under Syrian occupation since January 1976."

> 'I have expressed my full support for peace negotiations'

He added that Israel, as a peace-loving nation, is naturally interested in talks with Syria, but questioned whether Damascus really wants peace, or is merely trying to ease pressure being exerted by the Americans. Any talks must begin without preconditions, Sharon said.

Earlier, Sharon told the cabinet, "We shouldn't rush to embrace the Syrians before thoroughly investigating what lies behind the Syrian initiative" to resume peace talks.

Responding to Justice Minister Yosef Lapid's argument that Israel should unequivocally announce its support for peace negotiations, Sharon added that he supports talks with all the Arab states, including Syria and Libya, but they must first prove they are willing to wage an uncompromising war on terror.

"I have expressed my full support for peace negotiations," Sharon said. "Obviously Israel is interested in peace with Syria, but we must not forget what the head of Military Intelligence told the cabinet meeting last week – that Syria is still assisting anti-Israel terrorism.

"Just as we demand that the Palestinians dismantle terror [groups] before beginning negotiations, we make the same demand of the Syrians. This is an Israeli interest, which, despite our strong desire for peace, we cannot concede."

Right-wingers take to the streets

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Israeli settlers packed Tel Aviv's Rabin Square Sunday evening to send a strong message to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon: don't dismantle Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

But whether the rally of an estimated 100,000 people will have any effect on the Sharon government's plans remains to be seen.

The father of the settlement movement, Sharon recently announced a plan to dismantle or move some Jewish towns in the West Bank and Gaza as part of a plan to unilaterally disengage from the Palestinians if progress in peace negotiations is not made in the next few months.

Sharon also pledged to remove illegal settler outposts in the near future to fulfil Israel's commitments under the U.S.-sponsored "road map" peace plan.

Police helicopters buzzed overhead and Israeli flags flapped in the wind as demonstrators hoisted signs at the rally reading "To divide our land is to defy God" and "Settlers are the real security fence."

A large blue and white banner was unfurled across the podium reading, "Israel will not bend."

Several speakers sat under the banner, including several government ministers. A few Knesset members from Sharon's Likud party attended the rally, despite pressure from the prime minister not to do so.

Settlers, who were bused in from the West Bank and Gaza Strip for the rally, say it is their biblical birthright to settle in the disputed territories, which they claim as part of the Land of Israel.

The international community, including the U.S. government, agrees with the Palestinians that the settlements are a major stumbling block to peace efforts.

Effi Eitam, the head of the National Religious Party and Sharon's housing minister, vowed to pull his party out of the government if Sharon follows through on his plan to dismantle settlements.

"There is no capitulation in the battlefield," Eitam told the demonstrators. "Capitulation is defeatist, and our red line is made from the blood of those who have been killed."

Yet the prime minister's resolve in carrying out his plans appears to be strong.

"Things are decided, not by demonstrators, but by the government, my government, which adopted the road map," Sharon told reporters in Jerusalem.

"Although my government will make every effort to implement the road map, if we do not succeed, we will have to take unilateral steps of disengagement under which we would have to relocate some Jewish communities and redeploy our armed forces in order to provide more security for the State of Israel."

Spirits were defiant but festive at the rally, which was held in the same square where prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated in 1995. The square is the site of frequent left-wing gatherings.

The rally included loudspeakers blasting an unofficial anthem of the Israeli left, The Song of Peace, which Rabin sang shortly before he was shot.

Psalm-reading booths were set up on street corners, young men wearing large knitted yarmulkes tapped out a steady rhythm in a drum circle and teenagers danced to Israeli folk tunes.

Relations with Libya damaged over leaks

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom Sunday asked Shin Bet security service chief Avi Dichter and acting attorney general Edna Arbel to investigate the source of leaks about secret meetings his ministry was holding with Libyan officials.

Shalom expressed anger over the leaks sources say were made by the Prime Minister's Office in a deliberate attempt to sabotage efforts to establish diplomatic ties between Israel and Libya.

Speaking to the cabinet, Shalom said the leaks had been "very harmful."

"Every report about contacts with an Arab state that does not maintain relations with Israel not only hurts the chances of talking with that state, but also deters other states from having any contact with us," he said, adding he was willing to be the first to be questioned.

The Libyan contacts were first reported by a Kuwaiti paper, A-Siyasa, but were then picked up by the Israeli media, which reported that Ron Prosor, Shalom's chief of staff, had met secretly with a Libyan official in Paris.

The Libyans were furious over these reports and announced in a letter that they were suspending contacts with Israel.

The letter has dealt a harsh blow to what Shalom said in his speech to the cabinet was one of his ministry's main goals of improving ties with Arab nations. Shalom also said all contacts with states that did not have diplomatic relations with Israel were fully co-ordinated with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Grim Stats Lower

The number of terror attacks in 2003 dropped by 50 per cent and the number of people killed in attacks dropped by 30 per cent compared with the previous year, according to the defence establishment.

In 2003, 213 Israelis were killed in terror attacks, 50 of them members of the security forces, compared with 451 Israelis who were killed in 2002. "One shouldn't get the mistaken impression that the Palestinians have abandoned their campaign of terror against Israel," said David Baker, an official in the Prime Minister's Office. "Fortunately, the Israeli security services have been able to prevent the overwhelming number of terrorist attempts."

Georgians hope for closer ties to the West, observer finds

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Voters in the Republic of Georgia turned out in large numbers hoping for change, and they elected former attorney general Mikhail Saakashvili president in a free and fair election, said a Canadian parliamentarian who observed the voting.

Senator Jerry Grafstein, who serves as treasurer of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), was in Georgia last week as deputy head of an OSCE election-monitoring team.

The 450-person group found that, despite a few irregularities, the voting was conducted in a free and fair manner, Grafstein said.

Conducting his own informal exit poll during the election, Grafstein said people told him they trusted Saakashvili to improve their day to day lives.

"I characterize it as silent optimism, a deep thirst for change and they want to look West," Grafstein said.

Voters in Tbilisi, the Georgian capital, were so motivated to break with the corrupt regime of former president Eduard Shevardnadze that they braved sub-zero temperatures and a bitter wind chill for the chance to vote in the country's presidential election.

After waiting outdoors in some cases for up to two hours, they entered polling stations that were well organized and efficient and which were designed to prevent voter fraud or intimidation, Grafstein said.

Officials estimate voter turnout at close to 87 per cent, and Saakashvili was declared the victor with more than 95 per cent of the vote. The election came only six weeks after Shevardnadze resigned in the wake of massive peaceful demonstrations.

Saakashvili, a U.S.-trained lawyer who led the protests that brought down Shevardnadze, was known during his tenure as attorney general for prosecuting government corruption, Grafstein said.

Grafstein said he spent one hour with Nino Burdzhanadze, another of Georgia's pro-Western leaders who served as interim president and who is a vice-president of the liberal wing of the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly. They discussed ways Canada could help Georgia strengthen its democratic institutions.

Grafstein said he suggested that a Canadian parliamentary group designed to assist transitional democracies in modernizing their parliaments and institutions could be of use in Georgia.

Swiss blasted on Geneva accord

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZURICH — Swiss legislators are criticizing their government for offering financial and logistical support to the Geneva accord proposal for Israeli-Palestinian peace.

Foreign Minister Micheline Calmy-Rey came under fire last week from legislators and the Swiss Taxpayer Association.

The association is relatively small, but its leadership belongs to the Swiss Popular Party, the country's second-largest political force.

"The support of the so-called Geneva initiative is a waste of taxpayers' money," the association's president, Alfred Heer, told a Zurich news conference last Tuesday.

In addition, he said, government backing for the accord has harmed Swiss-Israeli relations, Heer said. The initiative, which was negotiated by Israeli opposition figures and Palestinians close to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, was strongly repudiated by the Israeli government.

Heer estimates that Switzerland's government spent more than $6 million to support and promote the proposal, which was launched Dec. 1 at a ceremony in Geneva. But Alessandro Delprete, spokesman for the foreign minister, denied the allegations.

"We spent just a little more than $1 million," he told JTA last Thursday.

Heer, however, said the Foreign Ministry also supported the initiative indirectly through humanitarian foundations such as the Henri Dunant Foundation.

"This contradicts the Swiss Constitution and the so-called Swiss neutrality," Heer said.

"By supporting the initiative, the Swiss foreign minister harmed the reputation and political and economic interests of Switzerland," added Christoph Moergeli, a prominent member of Parliament and member of the Foreign Committee who is close to Christoph Blocher, the country's new justice minister.

"I will push for this issue to be discussed in Parliament," Moergeli said in a telephone interview last Thursday.

"It is absolutely inadmissible that Switzerland interferes in a foreign conflict without the support of all parties in conflict. This is a slap in the face of the freely elected government of Israel."

Some Swiss Jewish observers were surprised that support for Israel came from a party that harshly criticized American Jewish groups for pressuring Switzerland about its role during World War II.

Switzerland's small Jewish community is divided on the issue. Most fear that criticizing the government's move could harm their ties with Calmy-Rey. But a segment of the community has been openly critical about Switzerland's role promoting the accord, which critics say undermines Israel's elected government.

"The initiative of the foreign minister, Mrs. Calmy-Rey, can certainly not be seen as 'Swiss solidarity with Israel,' as she put it," Arthur Cohn, a film producer and prominent Jewish leader from Basel, wrote recently in an article on Israel's Arutz Sheva news service.

"There is no doubt that the Foreign Ministry has, in secret negotiations, been supporting, both financially and logistically, unauthorized Israeli private initiators whose views are far removed from the Israeli political centre," Cohn continued. "At the same time, the Foreign Ministry has been knowingly forgoing any cooperation with the Israeli government, even to the point of not informing the Israelis of their intentions."

He concluded with a question about Jura, a Swiss canton where a group recently talked about seceding from Switzerland to become part of France.

"How would Switzerland react if, without the knowledge of the Swiss government, a foreign minister of another country had invited a handful of Jura separatists to his country to take part in secret negotiations over a period of time, offering financial and logistical sponsorship to thrash out a settlement deal for a new canton of Jura?" he asked.

Some Swiss Jews disagree and have sponsored an advertising campaign welcoming the Geneva accord.

EU reinstates cancelled anti-Semitism seminar

BRUSSELS — European Union Commission President Romano Prodi decided last Thursday to reinstate a European conference on anti-Semitism that he had cancelled two days earlier.

In a press statement issued by the European Commission in Brussels, Prodi said preparations for the conference will be resumed.

"I believe we should confirm our desire to re-establish as soon as possible a fruitful co-operation with the Jewish organizations and, on this basis, to resume the preparations for the seminar. There are signs that things are moving in the right direction," the statement said. "We should not lose this chance of debating and facing an issue, the fight against anti-Semitism and all racisms, that goes to the very core of the project of a Europe built in peace and security as a 'union of minorities,'" it said.

Prodi's announcement to cancel the conference came after Jewish leaders accused the EU of "intellectual dishonesty and moral treachery" in handling the issue.

In a letter to the Financial Times published last Monday, the heads of two Jewish organizations accused the EU's executive of censoring a study on the rise of anti-Semitic attacks and the involvement of Muslim minorities. In the letter, World Jewish Congress president Edgar M. Bronfman and European Jewish Congress head Cobi Benatoff wrote: "Anti-Semitism can be expressed in two ways: by action and inaction. Remarkably, the European Commission is guilty of both."

The EU's executive reacted with fury to the accusations of anti-Semitism, saying criticism of Israel had nothing to do with hostility to Jews.

New Fagan novel draws on 19th-century influences

The Mermaid of Paris also inspired by E.L Doctorow and Garcia Marquez

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

In Cary Fagan's fourth novel The Mermaid of Paris, the protagonist, Henry Church, is a lackadaisical inventor in a small Ontario town whose beautiful and much beloved wife, Margaret, takes midnight swims in the river to relieve the pain in her legs.

As the story opens in the spring of 1900, Henry is pained and perplexed by the growing distance between himself and Margaret. That distance becomes a schism soon after the arrival to town of Count Belinsky, a larger-than-life Russian stuntman and lady-charmer who sets up his tent by the river's edge.

With their shared aquatic bravura, Margaret and Belinsky seem meant for each other in a way that she and Henry never were. When Henry's domestic world abruptly shatters, he departs on a desperate quest for both Margaret and the meaning of his life. In the second half of the novel, his search takes him to a Paris that proves to be as vibrant and emotionally alive for him as Ontario had been stilted and constrained.

Just as Margaret appears to metamorphose into a strangely different being, forever mysterious and unreachable, Henry also undergoes a transformation. Propelled on his Iliad-like quest, he becomes increasingly at home in a magical and sensual realm that sometimes seems as colourful as an Impressionistic painting. Eventually, he surrenders his futile dream of trying to attain the unattainable, and emerges stronger and truer to himself.

In part, The Mermaid of Paris is a study in contrasting manners, morals and sensibilities between the New World and the Old – between the late Victorian stuffiness of a British colony and the Gaulic earthiness of Fagan's richly Hugoesque Paris.

In the two years it took Fagan to craft the novel, he realized "it was a story about the mystery that human beings can be for each other – about how even those people who are dearest and most closest to us are enigmas in some way," he told The CJN.

"It's a story about a man who is deeply, perhaps obsessively, in love with a woman he couldn't quite grasp or understand... I think the novel is about two people who were in some ways tripped up by their time and their social standing and the roles of the period in which they lived. Once those roles were broken, they were able to become more truly who they are."

As Fagan readily acknowledges, his style bears affinities to works by such 19th-century influences as Ivan Turgenev and Gustav Flaubert, as well as such modern writers as E. L. Doctorow and Gabriel Garcia Marquez. There is also more than a pinch in the book of Edgar Allan Poe in the guise of a persistently present raven that, without any rational explanation, becomes familiar to the protagonist.

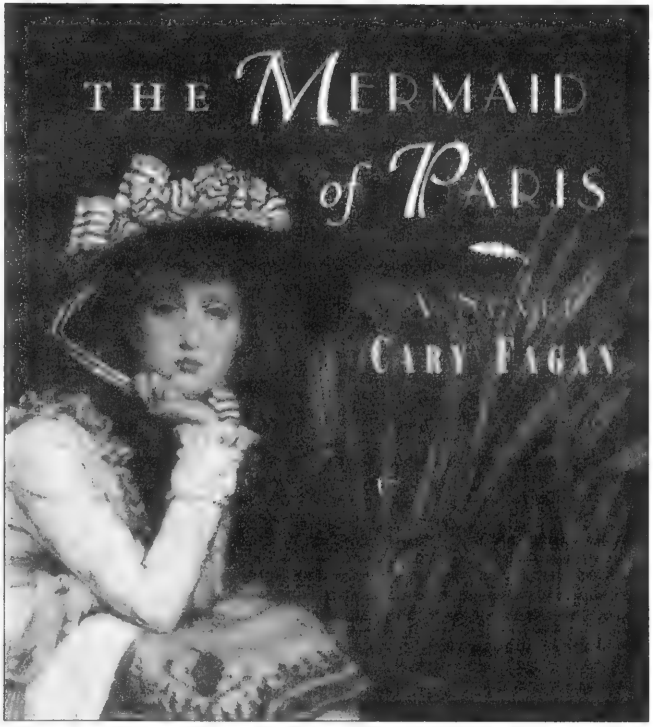
"I drew instinctively on writers that I love," he said. "I went through a long period of reading nothing but 19th-century fiction and a great deal of it was French, Russian and English fiction. The way these writers deal with character, emotion and story greatly appeals to me, and I wanted to pay homage to them."

Born in Toronto in 1957, Fagan worked as a magazine editor and magazine writer before publishing a first book of stories, History Lessons, in 1990. A second collection, The Little Black Dress, followed.

His first novel, The Animals Waltz, was published to good reviews in 1994. The story centres around Sheila Hersh, a Jewish woman who works in her father's mattress factory in north Toronto and whose curiosity about a deceased Austrian-Jewish poet takes her to Vienna, where she learns some lessons about life. (As in Mermaid, Animals Waltz offers a split between Old World and New.)

The Doctor's House, an experimental novelette that appeared in 1996, is more solidly placed in the Old World of history and tradition. It harkens back to a Jewish artistic milieu in prewar and wartime Warsaw.

Sleeping Weather (1997) examines the relationship between Toronto resident Leo Stone and his neighbour, a dissolute Russian immigrant.



Felix Roth (1999) is about two Jewish brothers from Toronto who embark on separate adventures in New York, one involving the legendary writer Isaac Bashevis Singer. Again, the characters seem in search of some more authentic aspect of themselves than they can find at home.

If The Mermaid of Paris is a departure for Fagan, it is possibly because of the seeming readiness of his characters to cut all ties with their Ontario roots. Fagan himself apparently has no such aspirations. He's about 170 pages into the first draft of a new novel that is "more of a Toronto Jewish novel again, so I have in some way returned," he said.

The recipient of a Toronto Book Award and a Jewish Book Award, Fagan has also written several popular children's books, such as Gogol's Coat (1998), The Market Wedding (2000) and T*he Daughter of the Great Zandini* (2002). The latest, The Fortress of Kaspar Snit, is due to appear in March. The variety of his output is striking.

"I have always approached every book and every story as unique," he said. "I've never been terribly interested in repeating myself or writing the same kind of book twice. After finishing a particular book, I'll want to try something new, and that keeps the writing fresh for me."

The Mermaid of Paris was published this fall by Key Porter Books and sells for $24.95.

Books analyze the new anti-Semitism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Malaysia's prime minister claims Jews rule the world by proxy. A famous Greek composer maintains Jews are the "root of all evil." A German parliamentarian says Jews are "perpetrators" rather than victims.

An Arab intellectual asserts that the Mossad was behind the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States.

A synagogue in France is torched. A Jewish cemetery in Canada is vandalized

Haven't we heard and seen all this before? Isn't it just the old warmed-over anti-Semitism that has plagued humanity since time immemorial?

Not really, according to two recently published books on the subject – The New Anti-Semitism (John Wiley & Sons) by Phyllis Chesler, and A New Anti-Semitism? (Renouf), a collection of essays edited by Paul Iganski and Barry Kosmin and published in Britain.

Writing in A New Anti-Semitism?, Jonathan Sacks, the chief rabbi of Great Britain, says the latest wave of anti-Semitism comes from three different directions: radicalized Muslim youth inflamed by extremist rhetoric, a left-wing elite strongly represented in the European media, and the usual suspects on the far-right.

Chesler elaborates: "What's new about the new anti-Semitism is that for the first time it is being perpetrated in the name of anti-racism and anti-colonialism."

The new anti-Semitism, she adds, targets Israel and Zionism. "Now Israel is the Jew of the world," she notes in a dramatic flourish. "The demonization of the Jews and of Israel has created an atmosphere in which the unthinkable and the horrific are becoming possible."

Is she implying that a second Holocaust is brewing? She seems to think so. "Jihadists will enslave or kill Christians and Jews," she declares, referring to Muslims who sympathize with or join Al Qaeda and like-minded organizations.

Is she deliberately exaggerating? Perhaps. What seems true is that the "brief honeymoon period between the world and the Jews," which lasted from approximately 1948 to 1968, has run its course. But was it ever a "honeymoon?"

Chesler's thesis is that we have entered "a new era of global anti-Semitism." The tentacles of this ugly phenomenon reach into virtually every nook and cranny. But is it actually new? It's doubtful.

From her perspective, "the war against the Jews is also the war against America and the West." No one can quibble with that hypothesis.

To Chesler, anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism are virtually synonymous.

"Today's new anti-Semite hides behind the smokescreen of anti-Zionism," she observes. "Scratch the veneer of most politically correct anti-Zionists and you will find a virulent anti-Semite." Though she may be right, she does not substantiate this accusation.

In any event, Chesler saves some of her most scathing vitriol for her fellow feminists and the European press.

She is critical of feminist magazines and newspapers that loudly condemn Israel as "a colonial, apartheid and misogynist state." She backs up her critique with fairly cogent arguments.

As well, Chesler lashes out at the many "progressive" Jewish women who seem "obsessed with the Palestinian point of view." As a seasoned feminist, she should know. But is "obsessed" the right word in this context? Perhaps "concerned" would be more appropriate.

Chesler contends that the European media have displayed "a marked bias" against Jews and Israel. But she does not present convincing evidence that Jews, as opposed to Israel, are the targets of such animus.

She is on stronger ground with the assertion that anti-Israel divestment has been undertaken in "extremely bad faith." As she correctly points out, countries with execrable human rights records, from Saudi Arabia to Syria, have escaped the scrutiny of most journalists.

Lest she be accused of being a propagandist, Chesler issues a disclaimer: "I am not a simple-minded apologist for the State of Israel," she writes, bemoaning the second-class citizenship of Israeli Arabs and describing settlements in the territories as "an utter disaster."

But Chesler quickly reminds readers that Israel has not constructed "an apartheid state based on racial differences or on concepts of racial purity."

Indeed, Israel's policies are "a direct result of security concerns," and bear no relationship to race, as was the case in South Africa.

In The New Anti-Semitism, Chesler offers an impassioned defence of Israel and debunks crude anti-Semitic lies. But once in a while, she overstates her arguments and commits factual errors.

Writing in A New Anti-Semitism? Antony Lerman challenges the conventional wisdom that we are currently experiencing the worst outbreak of anti-Semitism since 1945. He warns Jews not to exaggerate the threat of anti-Semitism, lest its "currency" be devalued.

In his opinion, the toxic mix of anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism roiling the Arab and Muslim worlds today is different from traditional European anti-Semitism in at least two respects.

First, hostility to Jews is grounded in "real political grievance." Second, this anti-Semitism increases or decreases by virtue of events. Fair enough. But what about Islamic anti-Semitism pre-dating Israel and born of religious and theological animosity?

In his essay, Peter Pulzer complains that the liberal press, and much of liberal opinion in general, is trapped in a time warp. Anti-Semitism, it assumes, is "the property of the far right." A good point.

Jonathan Freedland, in yet another essay, argues that "fierce criticism" of Israeli government policy "does not meet the definition of anti-Zionism, let alone anti-Semitism."

In additional essays, Douglas Davis lambastes the BBC for "its relentless… portrayal of Israel… as a criminal state," while Melanie Phillips claims that anti-Zionism masquerades as anti-Semitism.

In a closing essay, Richard Bolshover states that Britain's business world is "a friendlier environment" for Jews than it was in the past.

In short, The New Anti-Semitism and A New Anti-Semitism? raise important points about disturbing trends in contemporary society.

HOUSE OF SAND AND FOG DIRECTOR VADIM PERELMAN RECALLS EDMONTON PAST

Vadim Perelman, the Hollywood commercial director who has made a remarkable debut as a feature-film director with the recently released House of Sand and Fog, grew up in Kiev and as a teenager, immigrated with his mother to Edmonton, where he finished high school and attended the University of Alberta.

Vadim Perelman

In a recent interview with the Los Angeles Jewish Journal, the 40-year-old L.A.-based director recounted his early years in Kiev, where he lived in an overcrowded tenement with 14 family members and shared a bathroom with 60 neighbours. He and his mother lived in a slum in suburban Rome for several years after leaving the Soviet Union in 1977.

Well-established as a director of commercials, Perelman was in Italy on an AT&T shoot in 2001 and decided to return to his former home in a rundown section of Rome. His former landlady gave him a glass of wine and he left $5,000 on the table for her as he got up to leave. At the Rome airport, he picked up a novel – Andre Dubus III's bestseller, House of Sand and Fog, and instantly fell in love with the story. "I read the novel on the plane and I wept," he said. "I immediately knew I had to turn it into a movie."

Although Dubus had already reportedly refused requests from 130 directors, he granted Perelman the movie rights after hearing him tell his life story. Dubus, who like Perelman had grown up poor and had been raised by a single mother, said he intuitively knew that Perelman wouldn't "reduce the story into a digestible, Big Mac version of the book."

While in Edmonton, Perelman joined a teenaged gang that broke into houses, but a night in jail convinced him to seek a higher ambition in life. Taking a film course at university, he viewed a documentary on the making of Norman Jewison's Fiddler On The Roof and realized he wanted to be a filmmaker.

He described House of Sand and Fog as an "operatic tragedy" and, like a true Russian, seems to have an affinity for the tragic in his soul. "I've seen death and I've seen catastrophe, so I know how such stories can help people," he said. "It's something the audience can experience vicariously so they may live through their own tragedies gracefully."

Perelman's cinematic debut, which stars Ben Kingsley and Jennifer Connelly, is so riveting that it may be hard to top – but he certainly intends to try. His next project, he told the Jewish Journal, is a cinematic adaptation of Jerzy Kosinski's Holocaust novel The Painted Bird.

Canadian Jewry Between the Wars: Friends of Yiddish presents Up From the Page, a presentation by Vivian Felsen on her translation of the Yiddish book Between the Wars, by her grandfather, Israel Medres. Jessel Returns: Songwriter-comedian Ray Jessel, the first musical director of Toronto's Temple Sinai, was discovered decades ago by CBC producer Alex Cohen and whisked to New York where he began writing songs for Broadway. Jessel, who has spent most of his songwriting career on Broadway and in Los Angeles, has inspired epithets of "pure genius" from Variety and "outrageously witty" from the Hollywood Reporter.

"Hopefully, he'll be back," enthused Globe and Mail critic Michael Posner after Jessel's last performance here. Next week, Posner gets his wish when Jessel performs here in a bill that also includes Toronto diva Theresa Tova.

Catch the "one and only Sit Down Comedian" with guest artist Tova at the Top O' The Senator, 249 Victoria St., Wednesday, Jan. 21, through Saturday, Jan. 24, 9:30 and 11 p.m., and Sunday, Jan. 25, 8:30 p.m. Cover charge for early shows $18, late shows $11. Spontaneous singalongs in the house that groove built

Toronto Jewish band Bais Groove provides Diaspora with a voice

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Toronto Jewish band Bais Groove uses the stage to impart their messages of Jewish unity through funk-dipped music. From their interpretations of prayers such as Adon Olam to Shlomo Carlebach classics, their repertoire portrays the classics as reminders of Judaism's continued survival.

All in their mid- to late-20s, the band consists of singers Stacey Wintre and Rachel Mitchell, keyboardist Robbie Grunwald, percussionist Dave Bloom, guitarist Mark Weinstock, guitarist Jeremy Otto, drummer Ben Gaum and bassist Adam Blinick. They perform as an entire eight-piece group or in smaller groups for simchah events.

As I talk with Wintre, Grunwald and Otto in Toronto's Red Room, I notice their energy. They talk quickly, interrupt each other good-naturedly and passionately explain why they're committed to making music for Jewish audiences.

"Listening to us is like having a fun party," Grunwald says. "We take songs that everyone knows, don't change the arrangement all that much, but add our personalities to the music."

"We're providing the Diaspora with a voice," Otto says.

Grunwald, Bais Groove's main songwriter, believes the band's tunes are important for younger generations.

"The young need to re-explore old music that is losing touch with today's Jews," he says.

It looks like this city's young Jews appreciate what Bais Groove offers, considering the band's experience: they have opened for the popular Israeli band Reva LaSheva, played at the premiere of a Birthright Israel documentary at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, played at the Skydome for UJA of Greater Toronto's Walk for Israel – "We're UJA's house band," Wintre half-jokes – and went on an East Coast tour that made them feel like rock stars, Wintre says.

"We got a Ford Explorer, stayed in a great hotel in Halifax and appeared on a pro-Israel Christian radio show," she says.

Included the band's 25-song repertoire is Carlebach's Melech Rachaman, which fuses a klezmer feel with folksy harmonies; Grunwald's take on Avinu Malkeinu, which features rock-influenced guitar lines and a head-bopping drum beat; and a version of Hava Nagilah with a strong jam rock vibe over a funky chorus.

What sets Bais Groove apart from other Jewish bands is not only its song selection but its talent.

Wintre studied drama and musical theatre at Earl Haig Secondary School and Mitchell performed in musicals at McGill University. Together, they create warm and sincere renditions of traditional melodies.

Grunwald has been playing piano since Grade 6 and says he would love to make music a full-time career. Weinstock, who devotes most of his time to music and Jewish causes, has released two solo albums and toured extensively in North America and Israel.

The band is large but close-knit.

"Even though we're a large bunch, we get along so well," Wintre says. "In-jokes and camaraderie go a long way."

Bais Groove aims to show that kind of unity to its audiences of Jews of all ages. Campgoers and bubbies love how Bais Groove lay down the groove, says Wintre, adding that cheek-pinching the musicians is not uncommon.

Bais Groove is also leaving its mark outside Toronto. Otto tells me about a trip he took to South America, where he met several Israelis. After playing them a few Bais Groove tracks from the band's self-produced CD, Otto waited patiently for the Israelis to offer feedback.

"They went crazy. They couldn't believe we sang with real Israeli accents," Otto says. "That link, way out in South America, brought me closer to Israel."

This year, Bais Groove is looking to evolve and offer its music to varied audiences. The band members hope to play more simchahs and events and use the money to grow artistically. While they all have regular day jobs, I get the feeling they would drop them if Bais Groove truly became a house that the groove built.

New mystery novel combines fiction with historical fact

By CYNTHIA GASNER

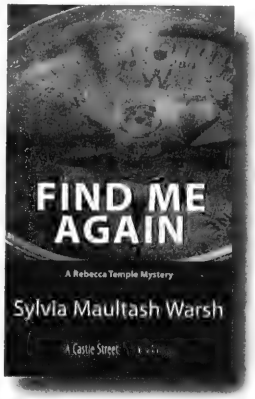
Sylvia Maultash Warsh recently published Find Me Again (Dundurn Press), a sequel to her first acclaimed historical mystery.

Her first book, To Die in Spring, was partly set in Toronto's Kensington Market with interwoven themes of the Holocaust and mental illness or perceived mental illness. The book was published by the Dundurn Group in 2000 in Canada and by Avocet Book in the United States in 2001 and it was nominated for the Arthur Ellis Award for Best First Novel.



As in the first novel, the major character in Find Me Again is Dr. Rebecca Temple, a Toronto family physician who practises psychotherapy. While coming to terms with the death of her artist husband, the young widow meets a charming Polish count who has written a historical novel based on his family's experiences.

During a visit to his home, she discovers a murder and realizes that the count's manuscript may contain clues to the killer's identity. Frustrated by the inaction of the police department, she scours the manuscript and journeys back to Enlightenment Europe, where she uncovers the true story of a love affair between the girl who would become Catherine the Great and the young man who would become the last king of Poland.

Warsh's book is much more than a mystery. To do research for Find Me Again, she went to Poland and Germany, and she says she found herself hunting down the places where her parents were born and raised and where they were incarcerated in slave labour camps.

Warsh was born in Stuttgart, Germany, to parents who survived the Holocaust. The family immigrated to Canada when she was four years old.

She grew up in Toronto, attended Downsview Collegiate and received a master's degree in linguistics at the University of Toronto. She teaches creative writing to seniors and is a published author of poetry and magazine articles.

The second Rebecca Temple book offers some surprises. A skilful writer, Warsh successfully combines facts that shed light on history with fiction that adds human emotions, in order to both entertain and provide insight into the past.

The characters in the 18th-century manuscript are authentic historical figures. "Though I have taken the liberty of putting words into their mouths," Warsh says, "I have tried to be faithful to actual events, with the exception of the 'contradiction of written history' noted in the story."

Although there is a great deal of historical information in the book, it is a very easy read.

Baycrest guide helps with care for those with dementia

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

January is Alzheimer's Awareness Month, a time when the public is made even more conscious than usual of this insidious disease and its effects not only on the person who has it, but also on those around him.

Alzheimer's disease is just one of the causes of dementia, a progressive neurological condition that attacks the brain. Dementia can cause problems with memory, thinking, judgment, language, personality and behaviour.

Alzheimer's accounts for about 50 per cent of cases of dementia. Other causes include Parkinson's disease and vascular diseases such as mini strokes.

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care has recently updated and republished Caring for your loved one; an education guide for caregivers of persons with dementia, compiled and edited by Bianca Stern, director of the occupational therapy department, and Nira Rittenberg, staff occupational therapist with the geriatric psychiatry community service.

Caregivers of those with dementia wanted help, information and ways to cope with the situation, presented in a simple, accessible fashion, Stern said. "They want practical coping strategies."

It is vital to seek a medical and physical evaluation if someone is showing signs of dementia. The same symptoms could be caused by depression, other illnesses or medications.

The book focuses on areas caregivers have identified as particular problems, such as home safety. The first edition dealt with many aspects of care, including coping with daily living activities, including eating, bathing and dressing, as well as medication and driving. Input from focus groups and professionals has led the editors to also cover sexual behaviour, leisure, preventing falls, navigating the health-care system and dealing with the spiritual needs of both the person with dementia and the caregiver.

Information is given step by step. It is free of jargon and divided according to the stages most people who have the disease will go through.

"The book is meant to be used," Stern stressed, "not kept on the shelf."

The book emphasizes, as does Baycrest itself, that a person suffering from Alzheimer's, or from any dementia, is still a person entitled to be treated with dignity and respect.

While short-term memory and learning centres of the brain are the first to be affected, long-term memory may last considerably longer, Stern said.

For example, a person can take part in shul services, sing the prayers and know how to light Shabbat candles even if she can't say what she did today.

This is a particular concern with the 60 per cent of Baycrest residents who are Holocaust survivors, Stern said. Some may think they are back in the camps, that the staff are Nazi officers, or that showers are gas chambers.

This was a real issue during the SARS crisis, Stern said, when the staff wore gloves, masks, gowns and goggles, and residents were isolated from family and friends and many of the activities they were used to.

Some people with dementia can remain in their homes for several years, depending on the speed at which the condition develops. Others need to go to nursing homes or other long-term care facilities.

In addition to the physical toll on caregivers, there is an emotional and spiritual toll as well. "There is a sadness about the loss of the person who was," Stern said.

It is a struggle for the whole family, she said. Everyone struggles to keep the relationship going, to make it as close as possible to the way it has always been, continuing to take mother out for coffee every Tuesday, for example.

There is a social stigma attached to Alzheimer's and other dementias, a fact that both the sufferer and the family recognize. Many people with dementia recognize, at least on some level, that their mental functioning is deteriorating, and they try to mask or compensate for what is happening.

"The social dynamics of how people react to them leads to great frustration," Stern said.

As the decline continues and everything becomes more confusing, routine becomes extremely important, and cues and hints are needed to help the person cope. The kettle on the back burner of the stove, towels in the same place in the bathroom, even taking tea at the same time and in the same place may help people feel they are more in control of their life.

Baycrest has a number of programs to help both the person with dementia and the family, including day care, assessment services, support groups and physical and occupational therapy. For more information, call Baycrest Seniors Counselling and Referral, 416-785-2500, ext. 2223. There is also information on the website, www.Baycrest.org.

It is important to note, Stern said, that contrary to myth, not all elderly men and women get dementia or Alzheimer's. In fact, she said, 90 per cent of those over 65 are cognitively healthy. Nevertheless, 40 per cent over 85 have some symptoms, which can have a tremendous impact on them, their families and the health-care system as a whole.

A separate resource guide offers information on services available from Baycrest and different levels of government, as well as on home delivery of groceries and alarm systems. There are also book lists and websites. It is available by calling 416-785-2500, ext, 2424, or at Baycrest's Ability Store and Gift Shop.

TIKKUN OLAM PROJECT: As their tikkun olam project this year, students at Bialik Hebrew Day School, along with other Toronto Jewish day schools, raised money for television sets for the Yoseftal Hospital in Eilat. Bialik held a successful Walk for Eilat. All schools together raised a total of $31,500. Grade 6 Bialik students also created a beautiful quilt to donate to the hospital. It was assembled by a group of Bialik parents and students and will be prominently displayed in the hospital lobby. Seen when they visited the hospital to present the quilt last year are Bialik staff members, members of the Eilat Young Leadership and Uri Korin, director of education of Bialik, left, with Dr. Zvi Epstein, director of the Yoseftal Hospital.

Israeli runner fails to qualify for Athens

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TIBERIAS — Israeli marathoner Zvadia Wodag failed in his bid to qualify for the Olympic Games, clocking a time of 2:16:04, good for third place at last week's Tiberias Marathon. Wodag's time was 64 seconds off the pace that would have earned him a trip to Athens.

Assaf Bimro, who had already secured an Olympic berth, finished second at 2:16:03. Bimro's and Wodag's times were the second- and third-fastest ever recorded by Israeli runners at a local competition. Israeli Haile Satain, who finished fourth with a time of 2:20:06, had already qualified for the Athens games.

Ethiopian runner Habtamu Bekele won the race with a time of 2:15:39, almost two minutes off the record pace set last year by countryman Mogas Taye.

Israel's top female marathoner, Nili Abramski, also fell short in her attempt to win a ticket to Athens. She ran a respectable 2:38:42 to easily outpace her competitors, but her time was 1:42 slower than she needed to qualify for the Olympics.

ספרותנו

"אני רגילה אליה, שכלם קוראים לה בשם,
ואני קוראת לה 'אמא'. אני רגילה אליה בחוץ,
ואני רגילה אליה בפנימה...
אני רגילה אליה במטבח,
כשהיא מבשלת ארוחת צהריים,
ורגילה אליה בבקר, לפני שהרכיבה משקפים...
אני רגילה לשנה שלה, ולריח של חכתנת,
ורגילה כשהיא אומרת: 'ילדה שלי',
וכשהיא אומרת: 'יסבשנת!'..."

סה"כ 14 שירים כשכולם מעולמה של דוברת צעירה שלא תמיד עושה חבחנה בין מציאות לבין משהו מדומיין. חלק השירים שמחים וחלק די עצובים. כך למשל מציג השיר חראשון באסופה תמונת בדידותה של סתם אשה: "יאשה אחת, תמיד דברה עם החתול/
היא ישבה על הכרסה, והוא ישב ממול./
ספרה לו על צרות יומה, ספרה על הבדידות/
והוא חכך את שפמו/ בבד של חרפוד./
אמרה לו: 'יקירי, אתה קשוב כל-כך./'
והוא לקק כפותיו/ ופחוקו נמרח./
והאשה שבכרסה המשיכה ודברה:/
אולי יהיה לי פעם טוב, אבל עכשו כה רע./'
הביט אליה החתול/לעפעפיו כבדים/
'אבל אתה' לטפח ראשו/ 'יחבר לי יחידי.'"

"בדיוק כשבאה אלי המלכה,/
עמדתי בחוץ ותלתי כביסה./ תתתונים וחלצה/
גופיה ומכנסים./ אמרתי לה:/
'תיכנסי בינתים' ואז בפטבח גלש חמרק/
וחעוגה בתנור נשרפה. אמרתי לה:/
'אכי אני רק...'/ אבל היא כבר עזבה./
בכרכרת של זהב, עם סוסים לבנים ורכב./
נפנפה לי נפנוף/ לפני חסיבוב./
אתמול כשבאה אלי המלכה/
חייתי בדיוק כל-כך עסוקה."

שחטובים ילכו ואשאר לבד."

"דניאלה שמחה בשקט
כשהיא מקבלת ציון טוב/
כשהיא מנצחת במשחק/
היא רק מחייכת חיוך דק/
שנכנס לתוכה פנימה/ ושם הוא נחנק./
אולי בלילה, כשעין לא מביטה/
היא עושה שלושה גלגולים במטח/
שולחת צחוקים לחלון חפתוח/
וקוראת: 'נצחתי!' לעבר הרוח."

BUTTERNUT SQUASH AND APPLE SOUP

1/4 stick butter
1 large onion, chopped
1/2 tsp. ground nutmeg
4 1/4 lbs. butternut squash, peeled, seeded, cut into 1-inch cubes
4 1/4 cups vegetable broth
1 apple, peeled, cored, diced
1/2 cup apple juice
Light sour cream
Chopped fresh chives

Melt butter in large pot over medium-high heat. Add onion and nutmeg; sauté until onion begins to brown, about 5 min. Add squash, 4 1/4 cups broth, apple, and apple juice. Bring to boil; reduce heat and simmer uncovered until squash and apple are tender, about 30 min. Working in batches, puree soup in blender until smooth. Return soup to pot. Season to taste with salt and pepper.

Bring soup to simmer, thinning with more broth if desired. Ladle soup into bowls. Garnish with sour cream and chives. Makes 8 servings.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman

"Innocent until proven guilty" is an idea rooted in Jewish ethos, which teaches that all people have a "presumption of honesty." Yet at the same time, our Sages teach us that most people sin in the area of monetary acquisition. The key is not to provide tempting opportunities for financial improprieties. Doing so renders one an accessory to the act and in violation of the biblical interdict of placing a "stumbling block before the blind."

An auditor who ignores red flags in a client's accounting records and meekly signs on the dotted line is at least as culpable as the actual perpetrator.

Being party to a transaction where income is undeclared is prohibited. One of the basic rights of governments is that of taxation, and Judaism sees the payment of such taxes as a religious obligation. This obligation was formulated at a time when taxes were collected to enrich the royal treasury at the expense of the populace. All the more so is the obligation required in a democratic country such as Canada, where taxes are (for the most part) used to benefit society as a whole, and where even our "kings" must pay taxes. Those who illegally avoid taxes are not just cheating the government but are actually stealing from their fellow citizens, and they are deemed unworthy of testifying in a Jewish court of law – their word cannot be trusted. The fact that governments waste some of our tax dollars is no excuse for us to shirk our legal and moral obligations.

Thus, when one knows or strongly suspects that taxes will be avoided – such as in the case of being told so directly by the vendor, the demand to make cheques payable to cash, the refusal of a retailer to use a cash register or to issue a receipt – then a purchase should be made elsewhere. One should not assume, however, that all vendors who request cash are doing so dishonestly. Often the convenience of cash makes its use desirable. After all, it is legal tender. Examples might include a garage sale or a home business where receipts and cash registers are used.

Historic Vatican visit

Israel's chief rabbis Yona Metzger, left, and Shlomo Amar last week visited Pope John Paul II at the Vatican. The rabbis asked the Pope to keep speaking out against anti-Semitism and to intercede on behalf of Israeli prisoners taken by Hezbollah in Lebanon. The Pope assured his visitors of his commitment to continue to improve Catholic-Jewish relations. The audience was the first of chief rabbis in the Vatican. [RNS/Reuters photos]

Scholar promotes Jewish studies in China

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

If it hadn't been for novelists like Saul Bellow, Bernard Malamud and Isaac Bashevis Singer, Xu Xin – the director of Nanjing University's Center for Jewish Studies – might never have blossomed into one of China's leading authorities in Jewish history and culture.

Before moving into his current academic niche, Xu's specialty was post-war U.S. literature, with an emphasis on American Jewish writers.

Delving deeper into their works, he realized that he could only truly understand their novels through a thorough investigation of their Jewish backgrounds.

As he immersed himself in their biographies, Xu – who did not meet his first Jew until 1985, when he was a professor of English at Nanjing University – gradually concluded that his real interest was in Jewry itself.

Xu Xin

Xu, the 55-year-old scion of bankers from the eastern city of Jiangdu, some 400 kilometres from Shanghai, has since transformed himself into one of China's best known "Jewish" scholars.

Here last week to deliver lectures at York University's Centre for Jewish Studies and Temple Emanuel, Xu has carved out a special place for himself in Chinese academia.

Sharon: Jordan leads opposition to security fence

By ALUF BENN
and GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Monday that Jordan is leading the Arab world against Israel's security fence at the International Court of Justice in The Hague, Israel Radio reported.

The prime minister, speaking at a Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee discussion on the West Bank separation fence, said that Amman fears that erecting the fence will cause thousands of Palestinians to immigrate to Jordan. Sharon warned Jordan that it had a lot to lose if its ties with Israel were harmed.

Amman fears influx of Palestinians

Sharon told the panel that changes will be made in the route of the fence due to internal considerations and not because of next month's hearings on the barrier at the International Court of Justice (ICJ) or demands by the Palestinians and the United Nations, Army Radio reported.

Meanwhile, Israel's High Court of Justice on Monday issued a temporary injunction giving the state 20 days to provide reasons for preventing the opening of gates in the fence and barring Palestinian farmers from reaching their land at reasonable hours throughout the day. The injunction was the result of a petition filed by the Association for Civil Rights in Israel.

The government will examine already constructed portions of the fence for ways to reduce the burden they impose on nearby Palestinian villages.

Support for Hate Unit

VANCOUVER — A delegation of multicultural groups led by Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, that included a gay and lesbian centre, a Chinese umbrella group and the B.C. Human Rights coalition announced last week it has received assurances from B.C. Premier Gordon Campbell and Solicitor General Rich Coleman that the provincial Hate Crime Team will receive increased funding and support.

The meeting was called to express concern about an "increase in various expressions of racism and homophobia in B.C.," CJC said in a statement. In previous such meetings, CJC has expressed dissatisfaction that the provincial unit, an arm of Coleman's ministry, has had its funding decreased. As a result, CJC contends, the unit has not been able to do outreach and education or fill vacant positions, including hiring a data analyst and a Vancouver police officer to join the unit's full-time RCMP officer.

Turkey Backs SWC

ANKARA — Turkey will support a global campaign by the Simon Wiesenthal Center to classify suicide bombing as a crime against humanity. The assurance was given last week by legislator Egemen Bagis at a meeting in Ankara attended by Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul and senior SWC officials. Gul and Bagis, who also serves as foreign policy adviser to Prime Minister Recip Tayyip Erdogan, said the recent bombings of synagogues and British institutions in Istanbul represented a new phase in international terrorism. SWC representatives also met earlier this month with Canadian and EU officials about the initiative.

More Jews Pro-Bush

NEW YORK — U.S. Jews remain solidly Democratic, although support for President George W. Bush has increased. An American Jewish Committee survey released last week shows Bush winning up to 31 per cent of the Jewish vote – up seven percentage points from the 2000 election – against all Democratic contenders except Democratic Senator Joseph Lieberman. Bush would get 24 per cent of Jewish votes in a race against Lieberman, the same percentage that voted for Bush in 2000. The poll shows sharp drops in Jewish support for Bush's war on terrorism and the war in Iraq.

Gefilte Fish and Chips?

LONDON — Fish and chips, the quintessential British dish, has partial Jewish roots, a recent study says. It has its origins in gefilte fish brought to Britain in the 19th century by Ashkenazi Jews, according to history professor Panikos Panayi of De Montford University in Leicester. But chips are not related to latkes – the potato tradition comes from French and Belgian pommes frites. Panayi studies how immigration and globalization have affected the British diet.

Annan Speaks Up

NEW YORK — In a gala dinner with U.K. dignitaries last week, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan condemned Islamophobia and anti-Semitism. "No one should underestimate the depth of the scars left by the long history of persecution, pogroms, institutionalized discrimination and other degradation, culminating in the Holocaust, that has been inflicted on the Jews," Annan said. No one should use criticism of Israeli actions as a mask for anti-Semitism, but Israel also shouldn't use charges of anti-Semitism to stifle debate, Annan said. Israeli officials called the speech a "step in the right direction." The speech follows a UN General Assembly in which a resolution condemning anti-Semitism was withdrawn due to lack of support, and another resolution condemning prejudice didn't mention anti-Semitism.

Offensive T-Shirt Pulled

NEW YORK — The clothing chain Urban Outfitters has discontinued a T-shirt that critics said stereotyped Jews. The T-shirt, part of the clothier's line of ethnic T-shirts, bore the slogan, "Everyone loves a Jewish girl" surrounded by dollar signs, according to the Anti-Defamation League, which complained to the chain. The ADL praised the decision to pull the shirt, which Urban Outfitters said it took out of respect for the Jewish community. According to the ADL, Urban Outfitters said future production of the shirt will not contain dollar signs or other graphic elements.

Gallery to Return Painting Looted from Jews

OTTAWA — The National Gallery of Canada was praised last week by Canadian Jewish Congress for uncovering the fact that one of its paintings had been looted by the Nazis, and for initiating its return to the heirs of its Jewish owner.

The gallery has confirmed that Le Salon de Madame Aron, a 1904 work by French artist Edouard Vuillard that it purchased in 1956 from a Paris gallery, was stolen from French Jewish art dealer Alfred Lindon during World War II.

"The gallery has acted in an exemplary fashion on this matter," said CJC President Keith Landy. "Its persistence is particularly commendable considering that initially they were told by a family member that the work had not been stolen."

The gallery contacted the Lindon family in 2000 because the painting appeared in a catalogue compiled by the French government called the List of Property Removed from France During the War 1939-45.

Lindon's son Jacques told the gallery that – according to his recollection – the painting had ben sold. But German wartime records found by French archivists confirm the Vuillard had been stolen from the bank vault where the Lindons stashed their art collection during the German occupation.

The gallery was the first institution in Canada to post works with gaps in their ownership records on its website.

Court decision in Nazi case puzzles observers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The federal justice department announced last week it would appeal an Ontario court decision that stopped the deportation of a Nazi killing unit's translator, but Jewish observers are shaking their heads at the seemingly endless appeals and delays that are making the deportations of war crimes suspects virtually impossible.

Compounding their frustration in the case of Helmut Oberlander was the Ontario Superior Court of Justice's assuming of jurisdiction over issues dealt with by the Federal Court last summer.

"I think it's symptomatic of what we face on war crimes in Canada. We've seen this is in [alleged Nazi war criminal Imre] Finta, with [alleged Rwandan war criminal Leon] Mugesera," said David Matas, honorary legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada. "We have a judiciary that is insensitive to the problem, who have other priorities."

Ontario Superior Court judge Robert Reilly has "added another layer of judicial intervention that could have been brought and should have been brought at an earlier hearing," said Ed Morgan, a law professor and chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region.

> 'We have a judiciary that is insensitive to the problem, who have other priorities'

Two weeks ago, Reilly said he would assume jurisdiction on Oberlander's challenge to the Order in Council that stripped him of his citizenship, and he suggested there was a possible conflict of interest by two cabinet members – Citizenship and Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan and Attorney General Anne McLellan – whose ministries prosecuted Oberlander and who may have voted to strip Oberlander of his citizenship.

Reilly said loss of citizenship was so serious he would grant Oberlander's request that he examine whether his Charter rights were violated. He also questioned the secrecy of the cabinet deliberations that led to Oberlander's loss of citizenship.

Morgan said the Federal Court dealt with the Oberlander case during the summer and ruled against the former killing squad member. Oberlander should have advanced all his arguments at that time, in one forum. Reilly's decision to hear the case on the merits was puzzling, he said, adding that a Charter challenge to the revocation procedure "is an important issue, but you can't litigate by installment plan."

They seem to be using a defence tactic of delay, an approach that "has been successful to date," he said.

If Oberlander is successful before the Superior Court, all future cabinet decisions that impact specific individuals and which go beyond broad policy issues could be affected, Morgan added.

Matas said Reilly was "is being a busybody by simply getting involved."

Canadian "judges simply don't get it," he said. "They're just not sensitized to these issues. When it comes to these sort of offenses, they're so oblivious, so tuned out, they have so many other priorities, they're immobilized, so blind."

"The shooter, they can understand," he continued. "Everybody else, they lose track of. They can't deal with the mechanics of genocide."

Matas pointed out that a Federal Court judge found after a lengthy trial that Oberlander was an interpreter with Einsatzkommando 10A, a mobile nazi killing unit that swept through eastern Europe, rounded up Jews, took them to pits and shot them.

"Their only activity was murder." Interpreters told their victims "stand beside this pit, get undressed, give us your valuables," he said.

Spectacular violin night

From the editor's desk

Nothing more poignantly conveyed the relaxed, happy feeling generated by the Toronto Symphony Orchestra's Violin Spectacular last Saturday night at Roy Thomson Hall than the infectiously enthusiastic demeanor of the harpsichordist.

Seated at the back in the middle of a semicircle of a small, 17-person ensemble, she swayed and bobbed through Vivaldi's Concerto in B Minor for Four Violins in cool, rhythmic consonance with the music that pleased the audience so deeply. Her expression spoke for us all.

The four violinists who were captivating their harpsichordist colleague stood at the front of the stage, a breath's puff away from her and the rest of the ensemble, bringing forth smooth, soothing sounds from their instruments like buckets scooping sweet water from an overflowing well.

The leader of the violin quartet was Jacques Israelievitch, the TSO's very own concertmaster. The three others were fellow TSO violinists Adele Armin, Sergei Nikonov and Amalia Joanou-Canzoneri.

Whether calling and responding to each other or bowing in unison, the four played masterfully together.

They launched into Vivaldi's first movement Allegro with the full thrust of the concerto's recurring thematic passage, plunging us into the music as if into a refreshing pool – headfirst, playfully and with great energy.

The concerto was but the first offering of a delightful four-piece program that included Bach, Mozart and Rossini.

Israelievitch introduced each of the pieces in his trademark warm, soft-spoken and approachable manner.

"Bach means brook," he told us as he introduced the program's second work, Bach's Violin Concerto in E Major. "But this man was no brook; he was an ocean."

With light, deft strokes of the bow, the concertmaster regaled the audience solo.

We immediately recognized the melody, which served as the concerto's core theme. At one particularly moving passage in the first movement, violin, cello and harpsichord melted together into one sweet harmony.

In short course, the Allegro evolved to the slower-paced Adagio, a complete contrast in tone and tempo. Pensive, even sad in spots, the Adagio evoked images of consolation, almost grieving.

But just as quickly as the transition from Allegro to Adagio, Adagio gave way to Allegro assai, a much quicker tempo whose mood and musical message fell between the first two movements – serious but not severe, and no longer the light, airy melody of the first movement.

Jacques Israelievitch

Israelievitch was impressive, sharing from his soul his understated interpretation of the music that Bach had written nearly 300 years ago.

He then offered, and the audience accepted, "more Bach," an encore – the Gavotte en Rondo from Partita 3 in E Major. He played entirely solo, enthralling with his skill and musical charm his ensemble colleagues as well as the audience.

After an intermission, Israelievitch replaced the violin bow with the conductor's baton and directed a suddenly small orchestra of 35 members, in Mozart's Symphony 29 in A Major.

Mozart was 18 when he wrote Symphony 29. The composition was hailed in the mid-18th century, during Mozart's life, as a turning point in his career, indicating the advent of a certain maturity in the precocious genius' work.

For the evening's finale, Rossini's Overture to Semiramide, the orchestra swelled to 48 instruments.

"Most overtures are wasted on an opera public," Israelievitch said. "They are just settling into their seats when the overture begins and as a result, they miss the whole thing."

Lucky for us, Israelievitch chose to play the overture at the end of the program. And we missed nothing. It was a rousing, heart-pumping, stirring performance that opened with the thunder of percussion and brass and a warm, soft transition into a harmony of horns and bassoons.

The piece hit with full musical force, waves and waves of enveloping, loud sound washing over us. It had a momentum of movement that rushed inexorably forward to a triumphant finish through gentle, droplets of pizzicato plucking to a rising tide of strident, brass and uniform, long-stroke bowing.

The unison bowing by the entire string section was a breathtaking sight as well as an auditory delight. It gave powerful, literal meaning to the phrase "everyone pulling together for a common cause."

The evening was indeed spectacular.

Sar-El promotes volunteerism in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Len Berk believes in helping Israel with his own hands.

As president of Canadian Volunteers for Israel (Sar-El Canada), Berk has been to Israel with the organization eight times, and has helped out at seven army bases across the country.

Len Berk in Israel

At a time when tourism and volunteerism to Israel has declined, he says, Sar-El recruits volunteers to work at various tasks on IDF bases, allowing Israeli IDF reservists to be at home with their families.

The volunteers also relieve the Israeli government from paying reservists, he says. In 2002, Canadian Sar-El volunteers saved the government $400,000 (US).

During the week, volunteers who must be at least 18 years old, live and work on the base. They are provided with uniforms, and they eat meals alongside the soldiers and sleep in barracks.

On Friday and Shabbat, volunteers are free to visit relatives or friends or tour the country.

Berk, a retired electrical engineer and market researcher, first volunteered in Israel in 1991 when he went to visit his daughter and new grandchild in Jerusalem.

"Now, I volunteer every 18 months," he says. His latest trip was last year.

"I have repacked medical supplies for field first-aid kits, spray-painted gasoline cans, sorted uniforms, repaired helmets, and worked on a tank-repair base refilling tires on army trucks and repairing heat sealers.

"Every job is simple and easy to learn, and we don't know what we'll be doing until we get there," he says.

"We give Israelis a taste of our North American work ethic. Not only do we get a lot of work done, but people are happy and smiling while they work."

On average, each group that leaves for Israel year is made up of 40 per cent new volunteers and 60 per cent repeaters, says Berk.

Accommodation and food is paid for, but volunteers must cover their own air fare. Sar-El can provide for families to stay together on a base, provided children are at least 14 years old.

"People derive a tremendous satisfaction from helping out. They come back to Canada walking on air. They are performing a mitzvah, and they have a chance to visit relatives."

He started working at the Sar-El office five years ago, he says, and goes in daily to interview prospective volunteers, answer inquiries and supervise the office.

"I have found a new career. If I can't be in Israel, at least I can help out here."

Sar-El Canada holds orientation meetings before each group leaves so people know what to expect. "We show them videos and slides, and give them a handbook. We've been told that Canadian volunteers are among the most prepared."

Recently, says Berk, Sar-El Canada formed a program development committee, currently chaired by Anna Mae Belmont, in order to raise awareness about the volunteer program and share volunteers' experiences.

Andrew Baker, a committee member who has volunteered in Israel three times, says that in addition to wanting to help out and see the country, another thing all volunteers have in common is "an enthusiasm for old-fashioned, meaningful labour.

"Whether we oiled equipment, painted doors or cleaned warehouses, at the end of each day our accomplishments were evident, and we felt appreciated," he says.

Sar-El is offering a one-week program beginning Feb. 15, a student program beginning May 10, and a family week program starting June 20. For information call 416-781-6089.

Rambam's 800th yahrzeit marked with food, fun

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Recalling the Middle East of the early 13th century, men and women at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham draped themselves in shawls, munched on baklava and discussed the Mishnah Torah to commemorate the recent 800th yahrzeit of Jewish philosopher Rabbi Moses Ben Maimon.

The event consisted of a hilarious play about the life and times of Maimonides and a unique meal featuring authentic regional cuisine once eaten by the scholar himself.

Rabbi Meir Gitlin dressed for the occasion while taking on the role of Maimonides in a recent play at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham that commemorated the 800th yahrzeit of the famous Jewish philosopher and physician.

"The Rambam was the first person to take the journey from Jerusalem to Athens, [to link] the spiritual world to the secular world," said Paul Klein, the gala's brainchild who also wrote and starred in the play, which was performed by the Chabad Lubavitch of Markham Players (CLOMP).

The menu was based on 13th-century recipes from Egypt, Spain and Morocco, all places the Maimon family lived.

The culinary delights kicked off with lentil pottage, followed by samak, a grillled fish, and then basilla, a dish made of chicken in phyllo pastry.

Next came buran (or meat balls) in a chatzilim (eggplant) purée, then the Egyptian nana (mint) salad, followed by dukkah, a mixture of roasted crushed spices and nuts.

Couscous, baklava and pita bread dipped in olive oil were also served.

The progression from fish to chicken to meat reflected Maimonides' practice of beginning a meal with the lightest fare and progressing to foods that are toughest to digest.

The shul's sisterhood and members of its adult education committee were involved in preparing the food and the entire affair.

"I wouldn't normally enjoy lentil soup, but it's very good," said Yaakov Roth, who is not a member of the shul, but came for the unique blend of history and food.

"When I first heard about the idea of a play and food from that period, I thought it was really cool. It's something that you don't see very often."

Between courses, CLOMP's actors and actresses, clad in colourful turbans and immaculate shawls, sparked applause and laughter with witty vignettes, including performances based on Maimonides' spiritual, philosophical and nutritional beliefs, with some comedic spice thrown into the mix.

A highlight was a rendition of "Hey Big Spender" that was cleverly altered to "Hey Big Thinker."

CLOMP has previously performed two other plays – Markham Messiah and Chabad Lubavitch News.

Born in Spain in 1135, Maimonides eventually settled in Egypt, where he became a skilled physician, leader of Cairo's Jewish community and an esteemed philosopher, theologian and rabbi.

His greatest works were the Mishnah Torah and the Guide of the Perplexed.

"His teachings were so strong... that they transcended other religions," Steyn said.

"He symbolized all four cultures – Greco-Roman, Arab, Jewish and western."

Rabbi Avraham Plotkin, spiritual leader of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, said Maimonides brought "order to the Torah. He was the first to bring an encyclopedic style of the Torah."

The performance also coincided with the shul's chai – 18th – anniversary.

Paul Klein, clad in a green turban and sash, acted the part of a Maimonides-era sage in a recent play at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham that commemorated the 800th yahrzeit of the famous Jewish philosopher and physician.

The spreading stain

Unchecked, the raw hatred that feeds fanaticism and inspires others to hate will spread through society as inevitably as a pool of dark red blood through fine linen. In the end, all that will be left is the disfigurement of what was once fine. And what was, one fears, will never be again.

So it is now, many people fear, with Palestinian society. For the stain of Fatah, Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah-inspired hatred appears to be spreading its distortions and disfigurement even to the most intimate relations within that society.

Reem Salah Riashi

How else can one explain the recruitment by Hamas and Fatah of a young mother of two infant children to become a suicide bomber? How else can one explain the willingness by Reem Salah Riashi, the 22-year-old recruited to abandon her children – three and one year old – for the opportunity to murder Israelis?

She killed four Israelis, injured a number of fellow Palestinians, and of course, blew herself to bits last week at the Erez checkpoint in the Gaza Strip.

We need not wonder at the cruel exploitation by the "religious" leaders who preyed upon this 22-year-old. Their purposes are and have always been clear: to destroy the Jewish state. Their methods are also clear: no act is too heinous. They have been preying upon the weakness, naiveté, anger and misery of Palestinian youth for years.

But what of Riashi herself? What was her thought process? What was the perverse reasoning that led her to place greater importance on the slaughter of Jews than on the raising of her two infant children? What did the very idea itself of being a mother mean to her that it could be cast aside for so grisly an alternative? Where is Palestinian society headed? What values are becoming normative there?

At Riashi's funeral, Hamas spokesman Mahmoud Zahar promised more such suicide bombings, "until the Islamic flag is raised, not only over the minarets of Jerusalem, but over the whole world." He also enthused that "it is not enough to call [Riashi] a hero. Calling her a hero does not give the whole truth. This woman abandoned her husband and children in order to win paradise."

By failing to register any disgust for Riashi's suicide bombing, Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ahmed Queria conferred his tacit approval upon the action. He obviously does not understand that more than Israeli lives are destroyed when Palestinians strap on their suicide belts.

A terrible stain of hatred and violence may be spreading through his people – if it has not already done so – that threatens to destroy any hope for a future prosperous, independent Palestinian society.

"God could not be everywhere," a 19th-century Jewish novelist once wrote, "so he created mothers." For the sake of their children, may Palestinian mothers pay heed to this sentiment.

No ambivalence over CIJA

For those who may have experienced some ambivalence about the new organization Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), they must now be satisfied with the appointment of diplomat and political advisor Hershell Ezrin as its chief executive officer ("New advocacy agency names CEO," CJN, Jan. 8). Ezrin's career has demonstrated his keen balance of pragmatism and idealism, which is acknowledged and respected in the broad Canadian community. We should all be reassured in the judgment of the cabinet who recruited Ezrin, as well as Anne Golden and many others who will represent our community with distinction and balance.

Claims Conference answers letter

I was dismayed to read the inaccurate picture presented by Eli Pfefferkorn's recent letter to the editor concerning Holocaust restitution and compensation ("Claims Conference ignores survivors," CJN, Dec. 4).

The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference) allocates funds from the proceeds of the sale of heirless Jewish property in the former East Germany to institutions and agencies around the world that assist Jewish survivors in need, as well as to institutions that engage in Shoah research, education and documentation. More information on such allocations is available on the Claims Conference website at www.claimscon.org.

When allocating funds, our first priority is to care for survivors and to help them live out their final days in dignity. To state anything to the contrary is false and an insult to all those who benefit from the work of the Claims Conference.

No Czech memorial to Kafka

Baruch Cohen should be congratulated on his article on Kafka's Prague ("Sensing the anguish in Kafka's Prague," CJN, Dec. 18). However, Kafka is much more of a hero in the Czech Republic than Cohen could notice in a one-week visit. Kafka wrote in German, so he cannot be included among famous Czech writers.

The country has a rich past, as Czech, German and Jewish cultures flourished there before World War II. Today, this heritage cannot be recovered.

Jews were murdered and Germans were banished from Prague – hence the lack of a highly visible Kafka memorial in the centre of the city. Interestingly, the complications of his life – for example, his many preparations for marriage to Felice Bauer or his rendezvous with Milena Jesenska – fascinate the Czech press and public to this day, and this fascination is a memorial of sorts.

A righteous gentile

Some time ago, Rabbi Gunther Plaut asked his readers in one of his columns if they knew of any German Righteous Gentile honoured by the Holocaust museum Yad Vashem. The question seemed aimed at me, as I am a survivor of a labour camp, where I spent three years. The camp, called Bunzlau, had a huge woodworking factory owned by a Nazi who called the works by his name "Hubert Land Holzbearbeitung Fabrik."

We were guarded at first by Hilfpolizei, retired policemen. Later, the guard duties were taken over by the SS, who were led by a sergeant called Schrammel, a terrible sadist who stole our scant food.

In February 1944, he told us we were going to get a new SS commander who would teach us what a true SS man was. We were terrorized enough by Schrammel, and here he was telling us about someone who would be worse than himself. Because I was fluent in German, he told me I would have to help the new commander. I was frightened. Death would have been the punishment for any mistake – even just a single louse on my body – while working for the new SS leader.

When the new SS man arrived, I was surprised. He wore a German army uniform with no SS insignia. I was called to his room in the guard barracks. As I entered, I clicked my heels, as I was told by Schrammel to do. This made the man smile. He asked me my name, but I just told him my number. At this, he smiled and told me not to be afraid of him. "I am a soldier, not a butcher," he said. When I realized what he meant, I knew that this man was not who Schrammel said he was and that we would survive the war.

Rittmeister Wilhelm Michaels saved almost 1,000 Jews from sure death. I have recommended that he be recognized by Yad Vashem. I spent 30 years searching for Michaels. Unfortunately, I found him in his grave in Goerlitz. My search and the help I got from Rabbi Plaut have so far been for naught. Rittmeister truly deserves the honour of being a German Righteous Gentile.

Worthy second chance

I truly enjoyed reading your article by Sharon Karon ("Farm gives teens in distress a bright future," CJN, Dec. 18). 'A trip we had to make'

By BARRY AVRICH

Over the last 20 years, several masters of modern cinema have felt it necessary to unspool their version of the definitive Holocaust film. From Alan Pakula's Sophie's Choice (1982) to Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993), the horror and moral consequences of the Holocaust have been portrayed in larger-than-life, searing detail.

But it was Roman Polanski's Academy Award winning oeuvre The Pianist (2002) that would take me to Poland last summer on a truly cinematic odyssey, allowing me to walk among the eerie shadows of Pianist subject Wladyslaw Szpilman, Oskar Schindler and six million souls.

The trip was in keeping with longstanding themes in my own work as a filmmaker. By the time I turned 30, I had lost my father and grandfather, and a sense of mortality and history had spilled into my film projects. But the inspiration to go to Poland also reflected a new chapter in my life that I am preparing to write: fatherhood. I feel that, in order to embrace a new life, we must show respect for those who sacrificed their lives for our future. As well, Polanski's personal film had a profound effect on me, as my grandparents had also fled Europe to escape the horror of religious persecution.

I assembled a group of friends who, like me, have a direct ancestral connection to Poland. We all felt it was essential to touch a piece of history that is so supremely personal. In Warsaw, we would meet a team that included a renowned Holocaust historian and a rabbi. Our seven-day journey included visits to Krakow and historically significant towns such as Lublin, Zwolen and Opatow, as well as to four death camps.

Although everyone had committed to the trip, my friends were nervous. The potential for raw emotion and mental strain was real. Author and professor Irving Abella once told me that when he took a group of Holocaust survivors back to Krakow in 1992, he had a staggering experience that he wasn't prepared for. While touring, they encountered a group of SS soldiers in full uniform who suddenly came marching around a corner. The survivors literally collapsed in fear and absolute terror. Several feet away, Steven Spielberg was yelling "cut" after the scene had just been shot for Schindler's List.

At the remnant of the Warsaw ghetto wall

In Warsaw, the grey and sombre architecture reflects a city that has endured two lifetimes of oppression under the Nazis and Communists. Yet, a pilot light of spirit is burning under its blood-soaked roots. I put my hand on the remnants of the wall that surrounded the Jewish Ghetto and I could almost feel the vibrations of Szpilman's piano.

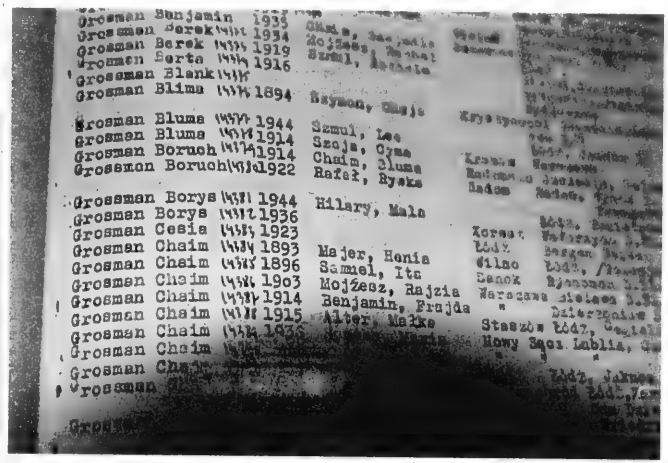
Our group spent hours in the Warsaw Jewish Cultural Centre going through records of relatives who either perished or survived. My wife found her grandfather, and one of our friends even solved the mystery of his mother's true age. The good news is that she's younger than she thought she was.

In the death camp Treblinka, nothing remains but a monument comprising hundreds of tombstones etched with the names of the villages that supplied human cargo to this death factory. It is a cemetery of villages. As I stood among the stones, I was overcome by the smell of burning wood from a nearby farm. I looked down, and I was standing next to the pits used to burn the bodies. The death camps are surrounded by working farms reclaimed by non-Jewish families who returned to them after the war. Although the land is soaked in blood, our Polish historian was not interested in analyzing any of this. The land belonged to the original inhabitants who had reclaimed rightful ownership. Case closed.

This haunting rationalization reflects the experience of a nation that has been forced to live among the remnants of one of the darkest chapters in world history. There are countless monuments in Poland that memorialize the atrocities and death that occurred under the Nazis. And there should be. But as a result, Poland deals in a bizarre form of Holocaust tourism. I'm in no way suggesting that Poland is capitalizing on the horror of its past, and I'm sure that given the choice, the Polish people would much prefer that the hundreds of thousands who visit each year were coming for other attractions.

But the Holocaust is a business in Poland, with book shops at each death camp, a Jewish Quarter in Krakow with Jewish-style restaurants and an annual Jewish Culture Festival.

When we later toured Auschwitz-Birkenau, I watched in horror as young Polish children ran wild, laughing and screaming, though the bombed remains of the crematoria. Adding to the visceral experience was a woman changing a baby's diapers on the train tracks that brought thousands to their deaths.



Examining the death camp's meticulous records.

Our historian explained that the death camp was a "cheap family outing" for many who could not afford anything else. It was a bizarre form of "Holocaust goes Disney." The economics of this kind of tourism comes with a steep emotional price for the Poles. Touring the country, you can't help but feel an underlying sentiment from them that their own spirit and majestic place in history were exterminated along with most of the country's Jews. This definitely does not sit well with them. There are no bragging rights in having Polanski and Spielberg recreate the darkest chapter in Polish history before their eyes.

The only remaining gas chamber is located in the Majdanek death camp. This large extermination factory is located just three kilometres outside Lublin, which was once an international city of Jewish scholars. The nail scratches of the people who tried to escape the chamber are clearly visible through paint stained blue by Zyklon-B gas. As we stared at the gaping mouths of the cremation ovens, we watched a young group of students sing the Israeli national anthem Hatikvah. For a brief moment, we experienced a blend of vindication and profound sadness. The young voices filled the drafty room as we watched the Israeli flag proudly bob up and down over the ovens.

In Majdanek [Barry Avrich photos]

Krakow is undoubtedly the jewel of Poland, with an architectural wealth that is breathtaking. It is also a city that borders the notorious Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp. Its Jewish Quarter – complete with bookshops, galleries and stores – is a fascinating restoration of what was once a bustling community. But it is an operation meant for tourists, not a rebirth of Jewish life in Poland. (Indeed, there are only 3,000 people registered as Jews living in Poland today. Before 1939, the census recorded a Jewish population of 3.25 million.)

I led a small group to Sabbath services at Krakow's ancient Remuh Synagogue, a treasure that looks like it was built as a set for a Spielberg movie. The synagogue is small, but its limestone walls and generous windows exude a light and airy feel. Chandeliers drop down from the ceiling like golden spider webs, adding a glow to an exquisite Aron Kodesh. I was touched to the core watching a 97-year-old Schindler Jew join us in prayer. Afterward, he introduced us to his 16-year-old son. Make no mistake, this was his child. He had felt a breath of mortality and wanted an heir.

We entered Auschwitz-Birkenau, our last stop before returning to Warsaw, on foot, passing under its famous iron gates with the ominous black words "Arbeit Macht Frei" ("Work will set you free"). A foreboding dark sky threatened us that day, but it didn't seem fair to have a sun in this kind of place. Every barrack was another horror show. Millions of shoes, suitcases, spectacles and two tons of human hair are the only sobering remnants of the millions killed at this camp. Our rabbi said the memorial Kaddish prayer at the foot of the train tracks, the same ones Spielberg used to recreate the horror portrayed in Schindler's List.

On our own train ride back to Warsaw, we reflected on a journey inspired by a movie. We all agreed it was a trip we had to take in order to ensure we would never forget what happened in Poland, and – more importantly – to put our relatively lush lives in perspective. Strangely, though, after years of being exposed to graphic Holocaust imagery in films, museums and memorials, coming face-to-face with the real thing was not as debilitating as we thought it would be. Films by directors such as Polanski and Spielberg had desensitized us to some degree.

Our historian was anxious for us to return to Canada and help sell the story of a Polish renaissance. This is a country with an emerging identity that's still a promising work in progress. It will take a new generation of filmmakers to put a different Poland in focus.

Awaken the nudnik within

Every so often people call me with the following request: "I'm giving a speech tomorrow. Can you help me find something to say?" Often they're nervous, perhaps with pre-speech jitters. But I also imagine that, like me, they find the notion of "saying something" to be intimidating.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

I know it's difficult to believe that any rabbi could be at a loss for words. Yet each time I speak, I'm apprehensive. I worry that my jokes won't be funny, my stories won't inspire and my speech will flop. Much of sermonizing, no matter how high-minded the topic, is entertainment. And like any entertainer, I'm never sure the crowd will like my performance.

My anxieties aside, the truth is that public speaking is easy. We all have something to say, we're just too polite to say it. It's our inner Canadian, the part of us too timid to offend, that stops our most impassioned thoughts from taking flight. We worry that if we talk too often about our enthusiasms, people might mistake us for fanatics. So we suppress deeply felt beliefs because we're afraid of being nudniks.

Unlike entertainers, nudniks are often unpopular. Jeremiah and Moses nearly lose their lives for repeating their message over and over again.

The few who challenge the consensus usually end up as social outcasts. But nudniks have something to say – a genuine, heartfelt message.

Over the years, I've seen previously mild-mannered people become nudniks. One rabbi, because of the assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, now works tirelessly on inter-Jewish dialogue. A mother of a disabled girl now crusades on behalf of disabled children. Responding to the intifadah, a housewife orchestrates a powerful grassroots lobby for Israel. In a moment of rage, these people found their inner nudnik.

There are entertaining speeches, and there are nudnik speeches. Entertaining speeches include poetic language, wonderful jokes and interesting anecdotes. Nudniks need none of that. Because the heart speaks a language all its own, a passionate speech doesn't require entertaining asides.

A rabbinic mentor once told me that every sermon should have a moment of outrage, when you feel like saying "damn it" and banging the table. I now realize that he wasn't just telling me how to get an audience's attention. He was telling me I have an obligation to speak about issues I'm passionate about. A rabbi is no mere entertainer. He must also be a bit of a nudnik.

So you're making a speech and need something to say? Find your inner nudnik. Get excited, bang on the table and speak from the heart. Your inner nudnik will help you make a better speech – and you never know, it may also make you a better person.

Lo nafseek lirkod: We won't stop dancing

The ugly terrorist onslaught of the last three years has imposed a new geography of anguish on Israel. The Israeli compulsion to rebuild, balanced by the Jewish commitment to remember, has yielded an urban landscape pockmarked by mini-monuments mourning the sites of Palestinian mass murder.

Gil Troy in Montreal

The beachfront stroll from high-tech Tel Aviv to the prophet Jonah's port city, Jaffa, passes Mike's Place, where a middle-class British Muslim poisoned by jihadist hatred murdered three music-lovers. It then passes the Dolphinarium, the disco where a killer later glorified by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat slaughtered 21 teenagers and wounded 120. Today, Mike's Place still bops to the beat that made it famous. Outside the closed Dolphinarium a simple monument promises defiantly: "Lo Nafseek Lirkod," We Won't Stop Dancing.

Despite the toll of Arafat's war, Israelis remain unbowed. Shopping malls are full, cafes are brimming, traffic is snarling, tempers are occasionally flaring and the warmth of many Israelis remains overflowing. After years that brought the sounds of silence to tourist-dependent Jerusalem, the sounds of the Americans have returned.

We won't stop singing or dancing is indeed the right response, the spiritual reply to 21st-century terror. But continuing the poetry and prose of daily life should not blind anyone to reality or blunt the rational response of anger at the outrages committed these last few years against Israel, the Jewish people and those who seek peace and champion liberal democracy. Jews and non-Jews should remain furious at the epidemic of terrorism that has killed thousands worldwide, and murdered more than 900 Israelis.

It is reasonable to rage not only at the terrorists but at their fellow travellers, the Arafatists who facilitate mass murder by "contextualizing" and rationalizing it. We need to confront and refute ridiculous yet dangerous documents such as "the basis for unity" for November's Toronto "Palestinian Solidarity Conference," which rejected a two-state solution and linked the Palestinian cause to a grab-bag of left-wing passions, including the fights for feminism and gay liberation and the fights against apartheid, colonialism and 30 years late – the Vietnam war. Where is the outrage? Why don't feminists resent the hijacking of their agenda to support a regime that epitomizes sexual patriarchy? Why don't gays protest having their cause co-opted by a Palestinian Authority that tortures homosexuals? Where are the historians to deconstruct the dishonest analogies demeaning campus discourse, to note that Nazism entailed mass murder, that Americans in Vietnam fought a war 10,000 miles from home, that apartheid South Africa mandated inequality and lacked no recourse such as Israel's Supreme Court.

The Israel debate often appears Orwellian. After September 2000, when Arafat led the Palestinians away from negotiation toward terror, too many Israelis, too many Jews, asked, "What's wrong with us?" By contrast, after Sept. 11, 2001, most Americans asked about the terrorists, "What's wrong with them?" Perhaps Americans could be a bit more self-critical, but many Jews could be less self-loathing.

Standing at the outskirts of Jerusalem, seeing that finally a wire fence blocks the route at least 10 terrorists took to kill dozens of innocents, one wonders why Israel waited so long to build this barrier and how the world dare begrudge any state a well-protected border.

The relentless attack against Jews' deep ties to Israel, the ugly violence being controlled daily by an Israel Defence Force open to worldwide scrutiny and fighting with great restraint, the hate-filled rhetoric pervading the Islamic world, represent a systematic attempt to rob the Jewish people of their past and ruin the Israeli present, in order to destroy our future. No people should apologize for defending themselves under such circumstances. And that is where the anger and the joy become essential. "Lo Nafseek Lirkod" encourages spiritual and military resistance.

These days, Jerusalem has been relatively quiet, thanks partially to the much maligned fence. Today's loud boom, boom rocking Jaffa Road, the site of many bombings, is the sound of construction crews laying monorail lines.

Much of the world has written off Israel, yet Israelis are building their future. That kind of vision fuelled 19th-century Zionists to dream the seemingly unrealistic dream of a Jewish state – and make it happen. These days, that same optimism should fuel their great-grandchildren to dream of living in a state of peace, and make that happen, too.

Making friends

Who would have thought it possible half a century ago? Twenty Jewish and German researchers sitting in a Berlin conference room together for three days, sharing their research on women and the Shoah.

The meeting grew out of a long-term collaborative research project between Israeli and German historians focusing on the archives at the concentration camp Ravensbrück, which became available for researchers only with the fall of the Iron Curtain. A few were survivors; many were children of Jews or Germans who had been implicated in the Nazi genocide.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Part of what draws German historians to work on Ravensbrück is its history as a women's camp for German dissidents who had been actively engaged in anti-Nazi activities and willing to pay the price of conscience. Jewish researchers cautioned their German colleagues not to rewrite history, and also sympathized with their search for a moral legacy. With complicated personal and collective connections to the Holocaust, Jews and Germans share in a project of moral outrage and commitment to the future.

I kept the Berlin meeting in mind during conversations with several Jewish and Israeli professors who described collaborative ventures with Al-Quds University, the Arab institution headed by Sari Nusseibeh and based in Jerusalem.

A major Jewish university in the United States, for example, is working co-operatively with Al-Quds to solidify the Arab institute by strengthening its administrative infrastructure and course offerings. In what is described as "a dynamic trans-Atlantic partnership," faculty and staff from Brandeis and Al-Quds universities are working together, hoping to bring Palestinian students to Brandeis for education in law, diplomacy and Middle East studies to prepare them for future roles as policy-makers and leaders. Also in place are co-operative projects between Al-Quds and Israeli institutions, such as Bar Ilan, Tel Aviv, Ben-Gurion, Hebrew University and Bezalel Academy, on such issues as online communication, staffing, art conservation, medicine, humanities, and agricultural and natural sciences.

Why do these Jewish and Israeli academic institutions work with Al-Quds? They wish to back an educational institution that is relatively modern politically, to train young Palestinians to shape a democratic future. They bank on Al-Quds turning out a new generation ready to govern a state that will exist peaceably alongside Israel. Many Al-Quds professors work collaboratively with Israeli colleagues, and have worked or studied at Israeli universities. This, during an era when, shamefully, European scholarly societies and universities call for boycotting their Israeli colleagues.

Like the Muslim and Jewish students at York University who have committed themselves to talking with one another under the rubric of Shalom/Salam, those who create networks of research and collegiality are betting on the possibility of coexistence.

Make no mistake. Al-Quds views Israel through different lenses than Israel views itself, than most Canadian Jews view Israel. Some of the university's publications posit the continued history of the "people of Palestine" in the land, while refuting as ahistorical "theorized [Jewish] connections to the ancient past." Al-Quds refers to a long history of Muslim religious tolerance, with no mention of past persecution of infidels or present extremists. The search for common ground will be difficult. Some will decide that the time is not yet ripe to work with Al-Quds.

But Al-Quds advocates religious diversity, training in democratic processes and conflict resolution, and it works with Israeli institutions. And parties who are in general agreement have no need to "dialogue."

People who participate in such efforts to make new friends out of old adversaries are sometimes referred to as yefei nefesh, beautiful souls, too noble-hearted for the real world of war, politics and betrayal. In any event, it is argued, politicians will negotiate what politicians negotiate, will draw lines where they draw them. Yet we often hear that no politician can overcome entrenched hatred and suspicion. If that is true, then it would seem that a radical shifting of popular sentiment would empower a different politics.

Given the violence of the intifadah, trying to forge new friends out of old enemies may be a wild gamble. Unlike Jewish and German historians, who agree on the monstrousness of the Third Reich and a basic historic chronology, even moderate Israelis and Palestinians espouse national narratives that are incompatible at many points. This wager on the possibility of a peaceable future, even now, may be lost. If so, the effort is for naught, with no harm done. But if the wager is won...

Peace process stagnates as Israel seeks a remedy

Paralysis is probably the word that best describes the moribund state of Israel's peace process with the Palestinians. The internationally sponsored road map to peace, which was officially unveiled last May, looks more like road kill than an escape route from the endemic strife that has claimed the lives of almost 1,000 Israelis and nearly 3,000 Palestinians since the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In a recent reference to the intifadah, Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, Israel's chief of staff, said "we have passed the peak of the violent confrontation." In a narrow sense, he is right. Terrorist attacks decreased by 30 per cent last year, dropping to 3,838, and the frequency of Palestinian suicide bombings sharply declined after Israel's declaration of war against Hamas and Islamic Jihad last September. Since October, there have been only three such incidents, in Haifa on Oct. 4, in Petach Tikva on Dec. 25, and at the Erez border crossing on Jan. 14.

Compared to the flurry of suicide bombings in 2002, a crisis that prompted Israel to invade and occupy the Palestinian autonomous territories in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the current period is relatively calm. But in all other respects, Ya'alon's analysis seems unduly optimistic. In the past few months alone, Israel has thwarted more than 40 suicide attacks, and in 2003, Israel had to cope with an average of 40 daily terror alerts.

Mideast Analysis

Israel, therefore, remains on a war footing, and the armed struggle that has consumed the Israelis and the Palestinians since 2000 still burns brightly. Attempts by Egypt to reinstate a brief ceasefire (hudna), which collapsed last August, have foundered on Hamas' refusal to cease attacks inside Israel.

Having concluded that the Palestinian Authority cannot or will not dismantle the terrorist infrastructure that nurtures suicide bombers, Israel has exerted relentless military pressure on the Palestinians. The Israeli army has mounted raids into Palestinian towns and refugee camps, imposed curfews, arrested militants and demolished tunnels used to smuggle arms. As a result, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip have degenerated into war zones, and the halcyon days when Israelis flocked into the territories in pursuit of cheaper consumer goods, reasonably priced dental care and unsurpassed hummus are nothing more than fond memories.

The constant violence that besets Israelis – in the territories and in Israel proper – has torpedoed all diplomatic efforts to revive the peace process, redoubled Israel's resolve to build a security barrier through the West Bank and around Jerusalem and emboldened Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to raise the prospect of unilateral separation from the Palestinians.

After the collapse of the Oslo peace process, the best chance Israel and the Palestinians ever had to resolve their profound differences, the road map was widely hailed as a panacea. It envisioned a two-state solution, with an end to terrorism and security for Israel, by 2005. The Palestinians were to stop all violence and incitement and break up rejectionist groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Israel was to withdraw to the pre-intifadah lines, ease conditions for the Palestinians, freeze all settlement activity (including natural growth) and dismantle outposts erected since March 2001.

Both sides accepted the road map, though Israel's acceptance was contingent on 14 reservations. Despite Washington's best efforts to implement it, progress has been glacial, more cosmetic than real.

The first Palestinian prime minister, Mahmoud Abbas, lacked the will and the authority to crush the militants, possibly because he had no faith in Sharon's intentions. And Yasser Arafat, the PA's president, undermined Abbas by retaining control of the security services. Abbas persuaded Palestinian radicals to observe the ceasefire (to which Israel was not a party), but it was short-lived. The truce was destroyed by a resumption of Palestinian suicide bombings and by Israel's campaign to eradicate their perpetrators.

The road map was also gutted by Israel's disinclination to freeze settlement activity and remove all outposts, the construction of which Sharon had encouraged when he was foreign minister in Benjamin Netanyahu's cabinet. Outposts that were taken down invariably sprang up, and Israel's credibility was further eroded by the construction of a paved road to an outpost manned by the acolytes of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, whose Kach political party was branded as racist and outlawed.

The bigger issue, of course, revolves around the regular settlements, which are almost universally regarded abroad as an obstacle to peace. The road map is vague on their final status, but the backers of the road map – the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations – clearly see no future for them. Nevertheless, the population of these settlements has grown by 16 per cent since Sharon's election in 2001, and interestingly enough, the most dramatic growth has occurred in isolated settlements. The Palestinians, as well as the United States, fear that the unbridled expansion of settlements will block the creation of a viable Palestinian state, an essential ingredient of any peace agreement.

Ahmed Qureia

For the same reason, they oppose the route of the 728-kilometre security fence, which is expected to be finished within a year, and whose legality is currently being debated by the International Court of Justice in The Hague. A mix of barbed wire and electronic fencing, concrete walls and trenches, the barrier juts deeply into the West Bank, gobbles up to 15 percent of its territory and cuts off some Palestinian villages from their lands. United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan has denounced the fence – the largest construction project in Israel's history – as "a deeply counter-productive act," while even the United States has criticized it on similar grounds. Israel insists it is a response to the Palestinian Authority's failure to crack down on terrorism.

Indeed, in contravention of the road map, the Palestinian leadership, including its newest prime minister, Ahmed Qureia, has yet to deal effectively with this phenomenon. Citing the policies of the current Israeli government, the Palestinians claim they have nothing to gain by rounding up and disarming militants and thereby risking a full-blown civil war.

Palestinian leaders are convinced that Sharon opposes the formation of a contiguous Palestinian state in the whole of the West Bank and Gaza. They believe that he will keep the majority of the settlements in place and that he intends to retain a hefty chunk of the territories. They claim he is playing for time, and will offer them nothing more than a "toy" state consisting of disconnected bits of land separated by Israeli roads, settlements and bases. Last week, Qureia put Sharon on notice that he will work for a one-state solution if Israel does not alter its policies.

The deep mistrust and ill feeling between Israel and the Palestinians is such that Qureia will not meet with Sharon until he stops building the barrier and fulfills a number of other key conditions. "We are not looking for... a photo opportunity," said Qureia. "We are looking for a meeting that will open a political horizon."

Last month, after Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's startling warning that Israel may be forced to draw its borders unilaterally, Sharon offered the Palestinians an opening. In a major speech that may presage significant developments in Israel's long-simmering conflict with the Palestinians, Sharon announced plans to disengage from the Palestinians within months should a negotiated agreement prove elusive. Neither the Palestinian Authority nor the Bush administration was impressed, saying that Sharon's scheme smacked of an imposed settlement.

Sharon reiterated his new mantra on Jan. 5 at a Likud party meeting in Tel Aviv. But his promise to dismantle some Jewish settlements and permit the Palestinians to establish statehood within the context of a peace accord has elicited derision from hardline Likudniks. Sharon's advocacy of unilateral disengagement from the Palestinians may well be his answer to the mood of despair that grips Israel. In recent months, the chief of staff, as well as four former directors of the Shin Bet intelligence agency, have separately issued dire statements that Israel's policies toward the Palestinians, including travel restrictions, have been counterproductive.

At heart, Sharon's talk of unilateral separation may stem from a concern about the demographic imperative – the need to preserve Israel as a democratic Jewish state. Projections indicate that Jews will soon be a minority in the area stretching from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean Sea. Haifa University geographer Arnon Sofer thinks this moment has already arrived. Cognizant of these trends, the Labour party recently announced a peace plan for a negotiated withdrawal to the June 4, 1967, borders.

Jungreis offers prescription for a happy marriage

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rebbitzen Esther Jungreis sees hope in marriages that others might consider beyond repair.

Barring extreme situations such as domestic abuse, even faltering marriages can thrive, according to the New York-based author.

Her latest book, The Committed Marriage, is filled with examples including a wife who resents her husband's growing involvement in Judaism, a couple contemplating divorce because of his criticism and her nagging, and a family torn apart by the wife's two-year prison term.

"The Rebbitzen" – as she is respectfully referred to at Hineni, the outreach organization she founded 30 years ago – will be in Toronto this Sunday to speak about "The Committed Relationship." The event, sponsored by the Jewish Family Institute and Aish20s, will be held at the Village Shul.

In a phone interview from Hineni's New York office (there is also a branch in Jerusalem), Jungreis told The CJN she receives 100 e-mails a day from all over the world asking for guidance.

Her advice is firmly rooted in Torah, but much of her counsel, as described in the book, applies to anyone: giving your spouse your wholehearted attention, speaking in a warm, loving manner, developing a "good eye" (to focus on the positive), and even dressing in a manner that pleases one's partner.

"The truths of the Torah are universal truths," said Jungreis, who often uses her twice-weekly Torah classes as a springboard for personal counselling.

"We're living in traumatic times. We cannot change the world, but we can change ourselves and our family situations," she said in a distinctively soft, lightly accented voice.

Esther Jungreis

A native of Hungary and the descendent of generations of rabbis, Jungreis is a child survivor of the Holocaust who moved to New York with her family at age 12.

The petite blonde, who was widowed after 44 years of marriage, has a weekly television show and is a longtime columnist for the Jewish Press, an Orthodox weekly.

She said she was taken aback the first time a journalist referred to her as "the Jewish Billy Graham."

"I didn't see myself in that role, but it turned out very fortuitous, because as a result of that, wherever I went I had standing room only. Hashem has his ways of helping."

Jungreis believes that Jewish education today, for the most part, is lacking.

"We have much to improve in our schools. I think Torah has to be made a daily experience. It has to be shown that it's not a theoretical concept but Toras chaim – a Torah to live."

Torah definitely makes a difference in a marriage, she asserts. "When you have a spiritual connection, you have something larger than life to anchor you. It's important to have something larger in common, and [to know] you are] responsible to a larger authority."

From a practical standpoint, an issue like not wanting to visit the in-laws can be resolved by referring to the Torah perspective on honouring parents and pleasing one's spouse.

Above all, she believes, a "good heart" – empathy and kindness – is the most important quality in a spouse.

How does one distinguish between a good heart and more superficial charm? "There are so many little things that tell you about a person you are keeping company with," Jungreis said. "I don't think there is anyone who gets married and finds surprises. It's just that some people are so anxious for a marriage to take place that they close their eyes to things."

Jungreis said she can't begin to estimate the number of matches she has made. "Oh my gosh!" she laughed, in a vain attempt, thinking back to her first match at age 16.

On a more serious note, she said the role of matchmaker doesn't end "until you see them under the chupah – and [sometimes] after.

"I think friendship with the young couple is important," she explained, adding that young people need to hear that rough spots they're experiencing are normal.

Yeshiva University

Canadians Bring Jewish Education Home

As noted by our sages in Ethics of the Fathers: (3:21) "Without [financial] sustenance there can be no quality Torah education." And quality Jewish day school education in North America demands well-trained teachers, supervisors, and administrators who bring academic excellence and passion for learning to their profession.

$1 million launch

Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University's Jewish Education Scholarship Programme recognizes the need for training men and women for careers as educators in their home Canadian communities. In launching the Three-Way Campaign among students, donors, and Yeshiva University, Toronto's Canadian Friends of YU has raised more than $1 million to address the acute shortage of Jewish educators:

- Providing scholarship funds for Canadian men and women pursuing careers in Jewish education, or educators seeking higher degrees for career advancement;
- Underwriting scholarships and fellowships at YU's Azrieli Graduate School of Jewish Education and Administration, leading to master's and doctoral degrees;
- Offering professional in-service training at schools cooperating with YU;
- Creating incentives for graduates to pursue job opportunities—and remain—in Canada; and
- Accessing the rich and wide array of academic, professional, and religious resources of YU.

Orthodox historian foresees split in Conservative Judaism

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In some ways Stephen Speisman, a historian who became Orthodox many years ago, is still intellectually drawn to the Conservative movement.

He believes, however, that it has "betrayed" adherents in the past by abandoning certain traditions, and he is pessimistic about its future.

Speaking on a recent Sunday evening to an audience of about 50 people at Shaar Shalom Synagogue – a traditional Conservative congregation – Speisman presented a detailed history of Conservative Judaism in Toronto, followed by a more personal perspective on the "Development of the Conservative Movement in Toronto: Progress or Betrayal?"

Has abandoned certain traditions

The former Jewish community archivist and author of The Jews of Toronto: A History to 1937, Speisman, 60, is now executive director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park/Pardes Shalom Cemetery.

In his university days, however, he was an active member of ATID, the forerunner of KOACH, the Conservative movement's college outreach program. Speisman credited his synagogue at the time, Adath Israel Congregation, "in great measure" for his observance of mitzvot.

At the same time, he said, he had "tremendous ideological problems" with the synagogue because of inconsistencies in its services, reflecting a move away from the traditional format.

"Why do you belong to a Conservative synagogue?" Speisman asked the audience. "Do you belong to a synagogue because there is an ideological difference, or because there is traditional practice – or the appearance of traditional practice – but mixed seating, microphones, an open parking lot on Shabbos, [and] the shul does not impinge too much on your personal life?"

When the Law Committee of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly originally gave the green light to drive to synagogue, it was not because it was halachically acceptable, said Speisman.

Rather, he explained, it was a response to an "emergency situation" because many Jews had moved to the suburbs and could not easily walk to shul. "A lot of these families [would] be lost to Yiddishkeit [otherwise]," it was felt.

"[Now] it's taken for granted that the parking lot is open," he said. "The philosophy of the Conservative movement is buried."

The movement was started as a way to "conserve" tradition – in contrast to the earlier Reform movement – but it has ended up "catering to whatever the fad is at a particular time," Speisman said.

He reneged on the term "fad" – which he had also used to describe egalitarianism – after Paul Kochberg, president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian region, objected to it during the question-and-answer session. Instead, Speisman substituted the phrase "pressures from the laity."

Kochberg, who defended the movement on almost half a dozen issues that Speisman raised, said that driving on Shabbat is "not a simple question. This synagogue [Shaar Shalom] is considered one of the most traditional in the movement. Most of the members would not come here if they were not permitted to drive on Shabbat." He also noted that it's difficult to find a parking spot near certain Orthodox synagogues on many Shabbatot.

Kochberg suggested that it was "intellectually unfair" to dismiss women's involvement as merely ignoring rules. "There are a lot of learned people who would argue there is no halachah that would restrict women from participating in and leading services. There is a debate to be had."

Egalitarianism, Speisman had charged, has been "perverted" in order to accuse Jewish tradition of placing women in a secondary position. In the case of ritual obligation, he noted, the reverse is true. "Halachah says women are naturally on a higher spiritual plane than men. Men need the discipline of putting on tfillin and davening every day."

Female cantors pose a particular halachic problem, he said. Listening to a female cantor or Torah reader does not fulfil men's religious obligation, he explained. "A person cannot fulfil the obligation for someone if he or she is not obligated to perform that mitzvah him or herself... If women have their own minyan, that's not a problem."

He urged the audience to think about what their synagogue means to them, adding that Conservative congregations are at a crossroads.

"When [the Conservative movement] splits – not if," he asked, "where is your congregation going to stand?"

He suggested that Shaar Shalom might align itself with the Union for Traditional Judaism (a breakaway from the Conservative movement) or left-wing Orthodoxy.

(Halachic expert Rabbi Joel Roth – a JTS professor and co-chair of the United Synagogue's committee that is examining ways to reinforce the centrality of Halachah in the movement – also predicted a possible split in Conservative Judaism when he spoke to The CJN in November about the issue of homosexuality, which is expected to be addressed at a law committee retreat in March.)

"Speaking as a Jew who has made the journey through the Conservative movement to Orthodoxy," said Speisman, "my approach is [to ask] what's going to give me the best chance of carrying on [Jewish] tradition in my own family?"

Is Mount Sinai still a Jewish hospital?

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Times were very different for Toronto's Jews when Mount Sinai Hospital was founded in 1922. Before that, Jewish doctors couldn't intern in the city's hospitals, and once they did finish their internships, they couldn't get hospital appointments or privileges. Jewish patients couldn't get kosher food, and there were often language difficulties and little consideration of the needs surrounding religious observance.

Joseph Mapa

Today, Jewish physicians are on staff at every hospital in the Greater Toronto Area, including St. Michael's and St. Joseph's; kosher food is available to in-patients at every hospital; and all hospitals are aware of the multicultural makeup of their patients.

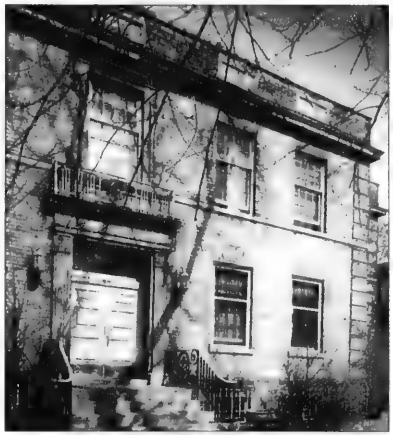
But what of Mount Sinai? Is it still the refuge from anti-Semitism in the health-care field it was created to be? Does it have to be anymore? Is it, in fact, a Jewish hospital at all?

Certainly, the public perception of the institution is that it is Jewish. Staff members, however, have a mixed perception.

David Davenport, outgoing manager of media relations for Mount Sinai, said that when he began working for the hospital in September 2000, "I had little or no knowledge of the Jewish lifestyle." Although Judaism was the predominant cultural influence, he said he felt very comfortable there.

"All cultures are recognized and blend beautifully.

"[Working here] opened a whole new world to me. I was enriched by getting to know the Jewish culture."



The original Mount Sinai Hospital

Anesthetist Gordon Urbach has another point of view. He said compared to what Mount Sinai was like when he first began working there some 40 years ago before Jews were accepted into the medical world, it has become less and less Jewish.

Today, he said, "you are just as likely to come across Jewish doctors, even doctors in kippot, and get kosher food in any hospital," adding that Mount Sinai is very discreet about its Jewishness.

"I guess that's the price you pay for integrating into society."

So is Mount Sinai a Jewish hospital? And what does "Jewish hospital" really mean? That the food available is strictly kosher? That no elective surgeries and procedures are done on Shabbat and holidays? That the staff and patients are exclusively, or almost entirely, Jewish?

Hospital president and CEO Joseph Mapa has an unqualified answer: "This hospital is rooted in and supported by the Jewish community, works according to Jewish values and embodies our Jewish heritage. We never pretended to be otherwise."

While acknowledging that Mount Sinai is a public hospital that receives public funds and is therefore responsible for serving the general population, Mapa said, "We were founded by the Jewish community, supported by the Jewish community and represent the highest values of the Jewish community."

Indeed, hospital publications indicate that most charitable donations to Mount Sinai come from Jewish individuals, charitable funds and businesses. But other donors contribute as well. Particularly noteworthy are the contributions made by the Chinese community, which recognizes the hospital's services to them not only as regular patients, but especially for its work during the SARS crisis.

Mount Sinai, Mapa said, is in the ranks of the world's best academic hospitals, an achievement directly connected to the values of chesed (kindness) and care of the sick that are an integral part of the Jewish ethos. Compassionate and skilled patient care, cutting-edge medical research and an active teaching program let the institution "stand very tall," both in the Jewish and general communities, Mapa said.

Funding from outside donors has enabled the hospital to make a substantial contribution to the recently completed Human

Institution has specific cultural-religious elements

Genome Project, an international effort to map every gene in the human body, as well as to build a pain management clinic, purchase new magnetic resonance imaging and ultrasound equipment, and conduct research into breast cancer, diabetes and neonatal health, among other projects.

Like other hospitals with a distinctly cultural character, Mount Sinai has specific cultural-religious elements: a rabbi, Rabbi Bernard Schulman; a shul with daily Minchah services; a Shabbat elevator; a sukkah; a public chanukiyah; High Holy Day services and Passover seders.

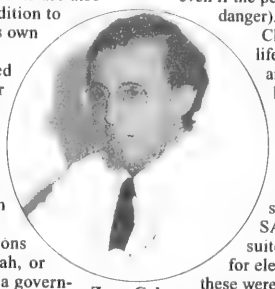
While the main kitchen is not kosher, no pork products or shellfish are served. There is also a kosher kitchen, which Rabbi Schulman said prepares lighter meals, and dinner is catered from the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

But while other hospitals don't have these elements like Mount Sinai, they still look after the needs of their Jewish patients.

The Hospital for Sick Children has its own on-staff Jewish chaplain. Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre, York Central Hospital in Richmond Hill and North York General Hospital, all of which are located in Jewish areas and serve many Jewish patients, have dietitians on staff and offer hot kosher entrées, including Passover meals, which they purchase from Baycrest.

Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of chaplaincy services for Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), and his staff provide religious and spiritual services for Jewish patients in all Toronto hospitals, including counselling, help with praying and supplying electric Shabbat candles.

Many of the JF&CS services are carried out by volunteers, but rabbis are also available for visits in addition to visits made by a patient's own spiritual leader.



Zane Cohen

Rabbi Schulman noted that while he is the director of chaplaincy services at Mount Sinai, the hospital also has trained Roman Catholic, Protestant and ecumenical chaplains, and regularly brings in Muslim spiritual advisors.

Mount Sinai's operations are not based in Halachah, or Jewish law, because it is a government-supported hospital, he said, but noted it has an ethics committee to deal with moral issues that may arise.

The staff knows that Judaism promotes a distinctive approach to medical issues, including many of the most complex, such as abortion and end-of-life, he said.

"They realize that what drug to use is a medical decision. When life has ended is not."

Such questions are brought to the chaplain for consultation, or to the ethics committee.

There is no question that emergency care, including surgery, can be carried out on Shabbat and holy days – including the High Holy Days – in accordance with the religious injunction of pikuach nefesh (that one may break any Halachah in order to save a life, even if the person is only potentially in danger).

Clinics and surgeries for non-life-threatening situations are another issue. Zane Cohen, hospital surgeon-in-chief, said that elective surgery is not carried out on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. This past year, he said, due to the backlog of surgeries caused by the SARS crisis, two surgical suites out of 12 were opened for elective surgeries. However, these were used only by non-Jewish personnel.

Mapa stressed that no Jewish staff – including physicians, nurses, technicians and maintenance – are forced to work on those days.

Although many of Mount Sinai's staff, particularly its medical staff, are Jewish, no particular note is made of the proportion of Jewish to non-Jewish personnel. Only 15 to 20 per cent of the patients are Jewish, Mapa said.

But, he said, "the percentages [of Jewish staff and patients] are less important than the fact that we are here."

The concept of "this is the right thing to do" – the proper way for a Jewish institution to behave – looms large in Mapa's and the hospital's thinking. For instance, every morning, up to 20 youngsters from Orde Street Public School come to the hospital for a nutritious breakfast. Afterward, either their parents or volunteers from the hospital walk them to school.

There is no charge for this program, Mapa said.

The hospital is also committed to Israel, and maintains relationships with research institutions such as the Technion (the Israel Institute of Technology), Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and the Weizmann Institute of Science. These relationships include exchange of personnel and co-sponsored research studies.

The Isabel Silverman Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO), led by Mount Sinai otolaryngolist-in-chief Arnold Noyek, was established to improve health care in Canada and internationally and to contribute to peace initiatives in the Middle East.

Mapa said CISEPO "bridges communities – including the Arab world – through health programs."

But it's one program in a hospital that is "open for the whole community as well as for us," he said.

That commitment is "our covenant with the Jewish community."

PA could dismantle Hamas if it chose

MYTH:

The Palestinian Authority (PA) is helpless to dismantle Hamas and Islamic Jihad because the terrorist groups are too powerful and popular.

FACT:

The media has helped create the misconception that the PA cannot dismantle the terrorist network in its midst because of the strength and popularity of radical Islamic Palestinian terrorist groups.

Hamas and Islamic Jihad are not huge armed forces. Together, the military wings of both organizations total fewer than 1,000 men. By contrast, the PA has 35,000 people in a variety of police, intelligence and security forces. Not only does the PA have overwhelming superiority of manpower and firepower, it also has the intelligence assets to find most, if not all, of the terrorists.

It is true that these Islamic groups have achieved some popularity, but polls show that together, they are only supported by about one-fourth of the Palestinian population. The PA is not a democracy, so its leaders do not base their decisions on public opinion, but the data shows that it is not hindered from acting by any overwhelming sympathy for the radical factions.

The PA could follow the example of the Jordanian government, which has not allowed Hamas to establish a foothold in the kingdom. King Abdullah closed the group's offices in Amman, as well as their newspaper, and has arrested and deported numerous Hamas members.

The Palestinians made the commitment to stop terrorism in 1993, and have repeatedly promised to do so since then, including their 2003 assent to the road map peace plan. But they still have not lived up to this fundamental requirement for peace. No progress toward Palestinian statehood can be made until the violence stops, and the PA cannot use the excuse that it lacks the means to put an end to the violent activities of a minority of the Palestinian people.

How can we fight the new (old) anti-Semitism?

By JACK SILVERSTONE

Guest Voice

I have a book in my office called The New Anti-Semitism by Arnold Forster published in the United States. What makes it interesting is its date of publication: 1974.

So what are we dealing with today? A newer anti-Semitism? The newest anti-Semitism? Or a "new and improved" anti-Semitism?

The late media magnate Israel Asper once said to me: "The Jewish agenda hasn't really changed in 3,000 years." He was right. It was and remains the Jewish agenda to combat the seemingly indestructible virus of Jew-hatred.

If the nature of the scourge hasn't much changed, then what is different today? For one thing, in this era of the Internet, the dissemination of information is global and instantaneous. For another, anti-Semitism has a new disguise – anti-Zionism or anti-Israelism – and a new principal progenitor, the Muslim world in general and Arabs in particular. Feeding off one another and pushing the envelope of attack discourse and acts of violence, the current promoters of anti-Jewish expression have no shame. They obscenely employ Nazi imagery to vilify Israel, trot out the Protocols of the Elders of Zion and blood libels in their updated form of Arabic-language television broadcasts, and turn international conferences into anti-Jewish hate fests.

Their fellow travellers in Europe have the gall to try to boycott Israeli academics from publishing their work and from gaining faculty positions in universities – a revised version of the "numerus clausus" that infected universities on the continent and even here in Canada before, during and after World War II. One visible minority Canadian parliamentarian told me that in today's atmosphere, it is more acceptable to be anti-Semitic than racist.

Yet at the same time, not everything is in the debit column. Israel has a strong military, and a staunch superpower ally in the United States. Here in Canada, there are anti-hate laws on the books, the Shoah has national and provincial legislative recognition, and Jews have attained positions of responsibility in most segments of society. But the "hearts and minds" department still needs work. Here are a few suggestions – non-exhaustive, to be sure.

- Let's support one another. If the current anti-Semites can employ a global, interconnected assault, then we must respond accordingly. In this age of 24-hour news channels, the Internet and satellite phones, we have to ensure that no community feels alone when confronting anti-Semitic campaigns or incidents.
- Let's draw strength from the people of Israel. Despite years of facing brutal terrorism, diplomatic isolation and economic trauma, Israelis have demonstrated exemplary resilience and strength, combined with a forward-looking "can-do" approach to life. We in the Diaspora should be no less courageous.
- Let's pick our battles. Not every comment critical of Israeli government policies or Jewish community positions is anti-Semitic, necessitating a full court response. Vigilance and determination are helpful. Hypersensitivity can be counterproductive.
- Let's reach out to our friends. Self-reliance is a virtue, but we don't have to struggle alone. We have friends in politics, law enforcement, the clergy, other ethnocultural and faith communities, the voluntary sector, professional associations and yes, even in the media and academia. It would be great if they always rose to our aid without being asked, but if not, we should not be shy to reach out to them. They may simply be waiting for us.
- Let's demand moral leadership. Political, spiritual, cultural and academic leaders must be called on to denounce unequivocally any manifestations of anti-Semitism, and the denunciations must be loud and public. Private correspondence and personal declaration of support are nice, but to be truly effective, our leaders need to take a strong public stance against all forms of racism and anti-Semitism.
- Let's resort to law and justice. If moral persuasion doesn't do the job by itself, in Canada at least the authorities can apply the hate propaganda provisions of the Criminal Code or employ federal or provincial human rights acts. They should be encouraged to do so when appropriate.
- Let's communicate and educate. Take an activist approach. Tell your friends and colleagues how you feel about the rise in anti-Semitic actions and sentiments today, the threats and the violence. Explain to them the hurt and damage caused by anti-Semitism over the centuries and why vigilance and denunciations are needed from people of goodwill. Let them know that we are an integral part of Canadian society and we expect to be treated with the same respect and compassion we treat others.
- Let's participate. Don't be an outsider. Join service clubs, get involved in the political process at all levels, be active in professional associations. There are many other options for participation in all facets of Canadian society. Similarly, students should be active on campus in meaningful ways, including participating in student government and university political and service clubs. As important as writing letters to the editor or to your member of Parliament is, it should not be considered a substitute for getting out there on a sustained basis and working in grassroots politics.

None of the foregoing is a universal panacea. But I believe the problems we are facing now will be confronted successfully.

"Be strong and of good courage," said Moses. Our cause is just, and if we remain steadfast, resourceful and brave, we shall certainly prevail.

Jack Silverstone, who wrote this article as the executive vice-president and general counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress, has taken a leave of absence to become the chief of staff for Minister of Human Resources Joseph Volpe.

Jewish Life

The spiritual side of Tu b'Shvat

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In the middle of winter, it seems strange to consider that the holiday of Tu b'Shvat is fast approaching. Tu b'Shvat signifies the new year of the trees and is usually accompanied by the planting of new saplings, particularly in Israel. It seems to be a holiday firmly rooted in the physical world. The images of nature, planting, earth, birth and development all reinforce our physical existence and the creation around us. While we must recognize this and celebrate it, we must also not forget the intensely spiritual component of Tu b'Shvat.

As with most elements of Judaism, this holiday has not remained stagnant through time. In ancient times, Tu b'Shvat was the date when Israelites designated which fruit belonged to the previous year and which would belong to the year to come. This is an important distinction for tithing purposes, similar to a modern end-of-year review for taxes. Of course, the spiritual aspect is relevant, since the fruit to be tithed is offered to God and thus is elevated from the physical.

Once the Temple was destroyed and sacrifices were no longer being brought, Tu b'Shvat was in danger of falling into dormancy or becoming meaningful only in the physical sense.

This danger was addressed beautifully by the mystics of the 16th century in the city of Safed, Israel.

The Kabbalists of Safed devised a seder for Tu b'Shvat modelled on the Passover Seder. Just as the number four is significant at the Passover seder, so it is significant at the Tu b'Shvat seder. Just as wine is central to one, so is wine central to the other. The difference lies in the central theme being recognized. At Passover we celebrate freedom and redemption. At the Tu b'Shvat seder, we commemorate the unification and growth of the physical world with the spiritual one.

Each of the four cups of wine at the Tu b'Shvat seder is accompanied by a fruit that signifies the different spiritual levels of holiness. Also, the cups of wine themselves vary in colour. The first cup contains white wine, which signifies winter. The accompanying food should be one with a hard outer shell and a soft inside (perhaps a nut), to signify our lowest level of spirituality and how we often encase our souls in rough shells that make them hard to access even to ourselves.

Each cup of wine gets progressively redder as each of the fruits eaten with them progress through stages of rough outer shells, soft outer shells and hard and soft inner cores. The beauty and power of the symbolism becomes evident through all the senses. The visual colour changes, the aromas and the changing textures are only some of the elements that infuse our sensory experience.

There is even a symbolic statement of gender through the shifting colours of wine, which represent the coming together of male and female to create harmony and growth.

Tu b'Shvat is more than a Jewish version of Earth Day, when we hug a tree. It has grown into a holiday accompanied by rituals that bring our bodies and souls into dialogue with each other.

The Torah states: "A person is like a tree of the field," and the midrash states: "the root is the soul and the branch is the body."

Bagels, part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

To butter a bagel
You need to finagle
Just to inveigle
The slithering spread
To the edge of the bread
[http://gopoetry.com/poem_tobutterabagel_10.html].

That's Alma Denny waxing poetic about the food that has conquered bakeries, supermarkets and fast food restaurants everywhere: the bagel. More than just a piece of dough that's boiled and then baked, the bagel has a special place in Jewish culture, history and even humour. Today, a look at bagels on the World Wide Web.

The origin of the bagel dates to the 17th century. (And some bagels taste like it.) Leo Rosten writes in The Joys of Yiddish that the word "bagel" was mentioned in print for the first time in the Community Regulations of Cracow, Poland in 1610. The food was given to women in childbirth since the circular shape was seen to represent the life cycle and an omen of good luck. The word is derived from the German word beugel, meaning a round loaf of bread. There are those who dispute this and claim it derives from the middle High German word bügel, which means a twisted or curved bracelet or ring [www.gti.net/mocolib1/kid/foodbreads.html].

Elsewhere, we are told of a Viennese baker who in 1683 "wanted to pay tribute to Jan Sobieski, the king of Poland. King Jan had just saved the people of Austria from an onslaught of Turkish invaders. The king was a great horseman, and the baker decided to shape the yeast dough into an uneven circle resembling a stirrup (or beugal)" [www.bagelboss.com/bagels.html].

Three hundred years after the king of Poland bit into that bagel, the food was gaining new fans in far-off places.

In 1989, Houstonians could buy them at the newly opened Guggenheim's delicatessen. "The restaurateur offering bagels, rugelach, herring, corned beef, and cheese cake at Guggenheim's was Ghulam Bombaywala, an immigrant from Pakistan." That's the opening paragraph of Donna Gabaccia's look at bagels and what they tell us about business, culture and the American immigrant experience. The social historian follows the bagel from its entry into the United States in the 1890s and "its transformation from a Jewish specialty into an American food." Along the way, she points out some fascinating bagel ironies, such as the famous affinity between bagels and cream cheese, "a product introduced and developed by English Quakers in their settlements in the Delaware Valley and Philadelphia in the 18th century" [www.hup.harvard.edu/features/gabwea/bagel.html].

Eating bagels can be hazardous to your health. No, I'm not talking about calories. According to the head of the Department of Emergency Services at George Washington Hospital in Washington, D.C., the greatest under-reported injury is hand cuts from slicing bagels. Peggy Trowbridge has accumulated some great bagel trivia, lore and advice in her Home Cooking site. She shares how to cut bagels safely (you don't need those acrylic holders) and how to store them: "at room temperature in plastic bags or freeze immediately. Refrigeration hastens staleness" [http://homecooking.about.com/library/weekly/aa011998.htm].

Next week, I'll tell you where you can find the best – and the strangest – recipes for bagels, including one for an improbable fat-free bagel. But for now I'll leave you with the tale of someone who decided that it's better to forego bagels' calories completely:

"A man opens an outdoor stall to sell bagels and puts up a sign, '50 cents each.' A jogger runs past and puts 50 cents into the bucket but doesn't take a bagel. The next day, he does the same thing. For weeks and then months, this goes on. One day, as he's jogging past, the owner joins step with him. The jogger laughs and says, 'I know why you're here. You want to know why I always put money in the bucket and never take a bagel.' 'No,' says the owner, 'not that. I just want to tell you that the bagels have gone up to 60 cents'" [www.post-gazette.com/columnists/20021208rubin1.asp].

Toronto students play important role in Israel summit

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Students from Hillel of Greater Toronto played an integral part in a recent three-day solidarity summit in Jerusalem, attended by close to 1,000 Jewish student leaders from all over the world.

The summit, which brought together 15 delegations and students from 25 countries, was held under the joint auspices of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) – UJA Federation's overseas partner – the Government of Israel, Hillel International and the World Union of Jewish Students. It was hosted by Natan Sharansky, Minister for Jerusalem and Diaspora Affairs.

This unprecedented event focused on helping students strengthen their connection to Israel and the Jewish people in order to improve their advocacy, considering the dramatic increase in anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment on university and college campuses.

"We were privileged to have with us at the summit a high-quality group of 20 Torontonians, through the Toronto Hillel framework," said Ian Wagner, the Director of Student Activities at JAFI's Department of Education. "The Toronto delegation was outstanding, showing great leadership skills as well as a passionate involvement in the issues students from around the world raised and deliberated over during the summit. They were truly a great asset."

The outcome of the summit was a document drafted by students representing each delegation called "A Global Jewish Student Declaration."

"I think that the highlight for our students was the two incredibly moving and inspirational speeches given by Professor Alan Dershowitz and Avram Infeld, the interim director of Hillel International," said Tilly Shames, Director of Israel Affairs, Hillel of Greater Toronto, who lead the Toronto delegation. "The other highlight was the interaction the Torontonians had with other Jewish students, from Siberia to San Francisco. It was incredible. That was probably the greatest aspect of being involved in a summit of this kind."

"Jewish students around the world were at the forefront of the struggle for freedom of Soviet Jewry 30 years ago," Israel's President, Moshe Katsav told the students. "That not only led to over a million Jews making aliyah, and thousands of others reaching freedom in the West, but to the eventual freedom of hundreds of millions of Soviet citizens, Jewish and non-Jewish, and the fall of communism. You have the power to change the world."

A community challenge!

The Chairs of this year's UJA Federation Walk with Israel - scheduled for Sunday, May 30 - Peter Ekstein and David Peltz, have issued a no-holds barred challenge to members of Toronto's Jewish community: "Let's make this year the largest Israel solidarity walk in the history of Toronto with at least 25,000 participants!"

Peter Ekstein

David Peltz

"This will be the preeminent event of its kind around the world, and all of Jewish Toronto has the chance of a lifetime to come out, have some fun, and more importantly, show their love, support, and unwavering commitment to the people of Israel when they need it the most," says Ekstein. "Toronto's always been there for Israel, but this year we need our community out in full force, more than ever before. It's literally time to "walk the Walk!"

"Last year, we had between 15,000 and 20,000 people out to the Walk, and this year we expect even more," says Peltz. "Peter and I were both on UJA's B'Yachad Mission to Israel this year, and we walked the streets of Jerusalem with 5,000 people. You wouldn't believe how much that walk meant to Israelis. It has inspired me this year to ensure that this event will be Toronto's biggest and best ever."

Organizers will be targeting more teenage participants than ever before; something that Peltz says is imperative.

"They're the future Jewish leaders, the future lifelong supporters of Israel and of our own Jewish community," says Peltz. "Giving of themselves in terms of money and of their time should be a normal part of their lives. We also want to connect them with Israel, and feel a sense of urgency about Jews taking care of each other."

The Walk will culminate with a celebration of all things Israeli during the RioCan Festival taking place at Ontario Place. The place will be buzzing with the sights, sounds and tastes of Israel, featuring an authentic Israeli shuk (market), and some great Israeli food and entertainment.

"Given the state of anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment around the world today, we have no choice, as Jews, but to come out en masse and show Israel and the Canadian government just how much we care," adds Ekstein.

Unique community partnership takes to the ice

A new initiative between UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and The Toronto Roadrunners of the American Hockey League promises to reap benefits for many of Jewish Toronto's underprivileged.

The Roadrunners, featuring forward Michael Henrich - one of the brightest young Jewish hockey prospects ever - is the American League affiliate of the NHL's Edmonton Oilers.

The new relationship between UJA and the team will see a portion of proceeds from a predetermined amount of ticket sales donated back to UJA which, in turn, will transfer those funds to specific projects organized by Jewish Family & Child Service.

"I think it's a great idea for the Roadrunners to get out into the community like this," says Henrich, a native of Thornhill. "It should help add to the fan base, but more importantly, it will give people a chance to make a connection with the team and the players. I'm looking forward to the relationship with UJA, as a Jew, and as a hockey player."

Henrich will be one of several Roadrunners to share their experiences with members of the Jewish community.

"As a member of the Jewish community myself, I feel privileged to be a part of this special initiative," says Joe Wilson, account executive for the Roadrunners. "I hope that this program can be the start of a great relationship between the Roadrunners and the Jewish community for years to come."

"This is a great opportunity for the Jewish community to be able to come out and watch a high profile Jewish athlete within their own back yard," adds Darryl Bricknell, also an account executive with the team.

The time is now for new Jewish advocacy organization

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

According to Hershell Ezrin, the recently appointed CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), it is important for the new non-partisan advocacy organization to be fully operational as quickly as possible.

"This is the right time for an organization such as CIJA," he says. "People recognize that the world is changing rapidly and there is a real need for this, and that's why we're here, the people have spoken."

CIJA will coordinate and strengthen the advocacy activities of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), while ensuring that each has its own clear mandate. CIJA-PAC (Public Affairs Committee) is a membership organization to enlist thousands of Canadians in Jewish advocacy efforts.

CIJA is funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other Canadian Federations through UIA Federations Canada.

"Right now, the main challenge we face is getting CIJA and CIJA-PAC up and running to be the effective advocacy tools we know they will be," says Ezrin. "Getting the professional and lay leadership in place and establishing an effective working relationship with them is essential. Then, it's about coordinating our efforts with the various organizations, namely the Canada-Israel Committee, Canadian Jewish Congress and National Jewish Campus Life to amplify and maximize their voices, and perfect a symbiotic relationship with them."

CIJA-PAC allows Canadian Jews, and all those who support Israel, the chance to be heard, and it is a unique opportunity Ezrin expects people to take advantage of.

"People should join CIJA-PAC because their membership is crucial to our success. Numbers count. The more people who register, the more our voice – and their voices – will be heard. We will tailor programs to specific interests, and will give people the tools and research needed to be as effective as possible in their Israel advocacy efforts."

And Ezrin insists that CIJA-PAC members will have their views heard on a regular and ongoing basis.

"We'll be coming to them, the people, in various regions," he says. "Members of CIJA-PAC will be heard from, that's what we're about. We'll be conducting monthly polling to get their views, and those views will be made known to the people in power."

Although CIJA operations have just begun, Ezrin cites an exceptionally favourable response so far.

"We've had excellent feedback from all sectors," he says. "People are already sensing our deep commitment and sense of urgency. They want us to provide leadership, to create innovative programming and different initiatives giving Canadians a voice."

Some of those initiatives include a recent brainstorming session, through the Canada-Israel Committee, that brought together some of the sharpest legal minds in Canada and Israel to discuss the ramifications surrounding Israel's new security fence.

legacy of life

Alice B. Herman 1911- 1983

Alice Herman's first study mission to Israel took place in the early 1960s, when large numbers of North African Jews were making Aliyah. Ever the ardent Zionists, Allie (as she was best known) and her husband Bernard headed first for Marseilles, France, where along with their fellow travelers, they bid adieu to the excited new immigrants who were about to set sail for Haifa's port.

Given her warm and compassionate nature, it wasn't surprising that Allie connected instantly with one particular North African family and, once her plane touched down in Israel, Allie rushed to the ship to meet them as they docked in their new homeland. Allie stayed in touch with the family long afterwards simply because she cared, assisting them financially and sending gifts at every opportunity to help ease their absorption into Israeli society.

"Mother described herself as having great empathy for people," recalls daughter Carole Zucker, an avid UJA Federation fundraiser. "She would take people under her wing. She may have been very private with respect to herself, but people felt they could confide in her. For Mother, a secret was always a secret. After her death, so many people informed us of how she had helped them in ways we had never known."

That, in a nutshell, was Allie Herman. Her life revolved around helping others and she did it selflessly and gracefully, whether nurturing her family, her friends, or her community. She immersed herself completely in things that mattered to her, be it as a proud member of Hadassah-WIZO's Ruth Chapter, as the first chairperson of Mount Sinai Hospital's gift shop, or as a founding member of UJA Federation's Lion of Judah campaign.

"Allie had great passion for the Jewish community," recalls Marvelle Koffler of the woman who inspired her to launch the first Hadassah-WIZO Bride's Group in Toronto, setting Marvelle off on her lifelong devotion to the Jewish community. "That's what makes all of us become involved. Whatever Allie did in the community was at a top level. She gave people a lot of confidence, and she built them up beautifully. She was caring, direct and focused, and her integrity was par excellence. When you work with people like that, it develops your own character as well because you look up to them and hope to emulate them."

Alice B. Herman

Allie Herman imparted her philosophy of giving to her children, too.

"If we don't care for our own, she'd tell us, no one else will," recalls daughter Wendy Eisen. "As a young bride I chaired the Young Marrieds campaign for CJA in Montreal and I was so proud of my first gift of $15. I remember Mom saying, 'Whatever you contribute now you must give more next year, for each year Jewish needs increase.'"

Allie, who grew up in Toronto as the youngest of seven children, received her first taste of community responsibility when she met her future husband Bernard's parents. Rose and Joseph Herman were ardent Zionists and early philanthropists for Israel and Jewish causes. When Allie married Bernard, then a young law student, the newlyweds moved into his parents' home which was always buzzing with parlour meetings for Jewish National Fund, Mount Sinai Hospital, Hadassah-WIZO, and a host of other organizations.

Several years later, when Allie and Bernard moved into a home of their own, Allie took what she learned and gave it her all. She became an active member of Hadassah-WIZO and an early female contributor to UJA's annual fundraising campaign, soliciting funds from her friends and acquaintances in Toronto and later from her Canadian friends in Palm Beach, where she vacationed each winter. If she wasn't winning golf tournaments, doing precise needlepoint or playing bridge, she would be working on a fundraising campaign or steeped in conversation with the many people who called on her for advice. At the age of 50, she taught herself Braille and, for many years following, transcribed books into Braille for the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

"Mother never stopped teaching Carole and me, always giving us sage advice," says Wendy. "She was a compassionate and understanding grandmother, with a ready ear for each of her eight grandchildren."

Allie took pride in her children's leadership in the community. Carole, a past president of Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary, is the new co-president of the Israel Cancer Research Fund and was recently feted by her Hadassah chapter for more than 40 years of unwavering dedication. Wendy, a former UJA Federation campaign chair, was a leader in the Canadian struggle to free Soviet Jews in the 1970s and 1980s and now serves with her husband Elliott as national co-chair of the Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum.

Carole's daughter, Tracey Moseson, is actively involved with her synagogue in New York and Wendy's daughter, Jodi Bager, is national co-chair of UJA's Ben Gurion Society. A poignant family moment took place last spring when Wendy's eldest daughter, Tammy Brown, co-chair of Toronto's Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum, became a Lion of Judah and was presented with her grandmother Allie's pin.

Legacy of Life is a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to honour the memory of those who were exceptionally devoted to the community.

Hungarian scholar focuses on Islam and Jewish philosophy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, Hungary produced an impressive array of Islamologists, or scholars who specialize in Islamic religion, history and culture.

And a disproportionate number of these figures – from Ignac Goldziher and Wilhelm Bacher to David Kaufman and Armin Vambery (Bamberger) – were Jewish.

Gyongyi Hegedus, this year's Ray D. Wolfe post-doctoral fellow at the University of Toronto, is following in their footsteps.

But Hegedus, 39, is not only an expert in Islam. With a PhD in in medieval Islamic and Jewish philosophy, she is equally at home in Jewish scholarship: she wrote her doctoral thesis on the Jewish philosopher Saadya Gaon, the most important early medieval thinker in Judaism.

Currently teaching a U of T introductory undergraduate course on medieval Islamic and Jewish philosophy, Hegedus studied Arabic and Turkish languages at the University of Budapest and Hebrew with a rabbi in that city.

Gyongyi Hegedus

Hungary was a breeding ground for Islamologists because many of them had a strong Talmudic education and their knowledge of Hebrew and Aramaic was such that out of interest they also learned the related language Arabic, she explained.

"So many of the founders of this discipline, who attempted to understand Islam on an objective basis, were Jewish."

Today, she added, Israel has become a centre of Islamology.

Hegedus, whose U of T fellowship ends in June, has what she describes as "a messy background."

As she put it:"I was brought up in a secular society, and baptized as a Catholic. But later on, in my adolescence, I discovered that my mother had been an orphan and that her parents had 'mysteriously' disappeared during World War II. I also know that my paternal grandfather studied in a Hebrew school with a rabbi in Szeged."

Although Hegedus is not officially a member of any religious denomination, she feels very much at home in an "open and enlightened Jewish culture."

Academically, she is something of a nomad.

During the 1980s and early 1990s, she studied in Syria, Tunisia and Turkey. Later, she spent a year at the Hebrew University's Institute of Asian and African Studies.

She has an MA in Islamic studies and philosophy from the University of Budapest and the Catholic University of Louvain, respectively.

Now a permanent resident of Canada, she earned a licence in medieval studies from the Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies in 2002

Hegedus discovered Saadya Gaon by accident while working in the library of the Jewish Theological Seminary in Budapest. There she classified Hebrew books, and while sorting through some, she stumbled upon his works in Judeo-Arabic.

Hegedus, who earlier this week was to deliver a lecture at U of T on medieval Jewish and Muslim philosophy, believes Jewish and Muslim philosophers worked on similar problems.

"What is knowledge? How can you justify a statement? How was the world created? What is prophesy? What is the soul?"

To an astonishing degree, they reached the same conclusions, she said.

Hegedus scoffs at the notion that a "golden era" defined Jewish-Muslim relations during the Middle Ages.

"This is a dream that was never fully actualized, but of course there were periods which came closer to this ideal. We know about relatively peaceful and tolerant periods, but also about fanatic and highly intolerant [Muslim] rulers."

In her view, the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in the United States were the "visible peak of a huge iceberg" of anti-Israel and anti-Western sentiment.

"It is a sorrowful fact that people in certain Islamic circles use anti-Semitic and anti-Israel language to express their frustration with the West."

Hegedus plans to return to Hungary in the summer to deliver lectures at the Central European University in Budapest.

"My future is otherwise open at the moment," she said. "I would define my status as living in academic nomadism."

Yiddish to be included in Lodz commemoration

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

After a family trip to Poland last August, Henia and Nochem Reinhartz felt compelled to lobby the City of Lodz to have Yiddish included in its official commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the Lodz ghetto liquidation.

Their efforts were rewarded last month when Jaroslaw Nowak, director of Lodz's office of promotion, tourism and foreign cooperation and executive director of the organizing committee marking the date this summer, confirmed that plaques recalling the ghetto would include Yiddish text in addition to the Polish, English and Hebrew originally planned. The New York-based YIVO Institute for Jewish Research will provide the translations.

The Reinhartzes, longtime Toronto residents who were both born in Lodz, learned of the city's intention not to include Yiddish from a Polish journalist they met on their trip.

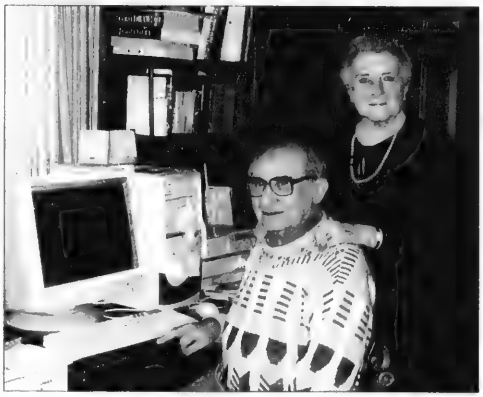
Although they had never lobbied before, their fledgling e-mail campaign took on a life of its own, striking a chord with people from New York and Buenos Aires to Melbourne and Paris, who inundated Nowak with more than 200 messages.

"That's how electronic democracy works," said a delighted Nochem, who admits there were moments when he was ready to give up, as weeks started turning into months with no results. Henia, however, was determined to keep going.

In an initial letter to Nowak, the couple offered to "translate as a labour of love as many inscriptions as you need from Polish or English into Yiddish."

The Reinhartzes, who run the Yiddishland Café – a five-times-yearly venue for Yiddish-language arts performances, based at the Workmen's Circle – have been steeped in Yiddish all their lives.

Henia, 77, grew up speaking Yiddish at home and was educated at a Yiddish-language Bundist elementary school. She spent most of her teenage years in the Lodz ghetto before being deported to Auschwitz at age 17. After the war, she trained as a Yiddish teacher in Paris, and taught Yiddish at Bialik Hebrew Day School and the University of Toronto.



Nochem and Henia Reinhartz

Nochem, a 79-year-old retired typesetter, grew up in Vilna and is also a native Yiddish speaker. Of his mother's family who remained in Lodz, only one survived the war. In Paris, where Nochem and Henia met, he set type for the Yiddish publication Unser Stimme (Our Voice). More recently, the pair translated the soon-to-be-published memoirs of Arnold Mostowicz, a Lodz ghetto physician.

But having Yiddish included on the commemorative plaques is "not a matter of personal victory," Henia explained. "It's really for the dignity of those who perished, and of those who survived, too."

Before the war, she noted, Jewish citizens comprised one third of Lodz's population of 700,000. Today the "registered" Jewish population of the city numbers 250.

"Polish children have no idea that [so many Jews] lived in Lodz and contributed so much to the economy and the culture of the country," Henia said. Renowned pianist Arthur Rubinstein was a native of Lodz, Nochem added.

Returning to Lodz for the first time since the war was a difficult decision for the couple.

At their granddaughter's request, Henia had promised to return to Poland on a family trip, but she was afraid of the effect it might have on her. The family arrived in Lodz 59 years after Henia was deported from the ghetto – almost to the day, she noted.

Nochem states flatly that it was "pretty depressing," but at the same time he felt it was good to go.

Henia, too, is glad she went, but the trip did not bring any "closure," she said.

"This is not a chapter you can close. You open it again. You go to confront certain things. You go because it's important for the kids."

Retracing the steps of her younger days, Henia was pained to find no signs of the vibrant Yiddish-speaking community she remembers. In Warsaw and Cracow, the couple noted, there were commemorative signs in Yiddish.

"If we hadn't gone," said Henia, "we would find out only later that there's no Yiddish on the [Lodz] plaques and it would have been too late. So, in a way, this is a nice ending to the trip."

Miriam Schneid-Ofseyer and Miklos Emhecht.

Octogenarian couple share love, laughter and poetry

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

"Laughter is the shortest distance between people," says 81-year-old Toronto artist, humourist, essayist, poet, composer and lecturer Miklos (Micky) Emhecht.

Three years ago, the native Hungarian-born Emhecht's whimsical and mythological paintings and poems, titled Dreams and Fantasies, were exhibited at the Children's Own Museum in Toronto, and they have been exhibited twice in Florida.

"Humour makes life more tolerable," he says. The retired real estate broker explains that "many years were taken away from us in Europe – the war, fascism, communism. In every tragic situation, you must find a spark of humour to survive."

Speaking with Emhecht, you are treated to an ongoing effusion of jokes, witty poems and short quips that are both entertaining and insightful.

Beside him during his interview with The CJN is his wife, Miriam Schneid-Ofseyer, 80, a retired teacher who witnessed many horrors during her childhood in Palestine and has had many artistic successes of her own.

Emhecht and Schneid-Ofseyer were married in 1998.

"I went from being what my friends called the most eligible bachelor in Toronto to the happiest man in the world," he says.

The couple, who enjoy singing, composing music and drawing, spend six months in Florida, where Emhecht's wit and wisdom are printed daily throughout the year in the North Port Sun Herald in a column called "Micky's Corner."

The octogenarian writes poems and vignettes on every aspect of life, often with wisps of sarcasm and tongue-in-cheek wisdom. He has published more than 1,200 articles and poems.

He says his goal is to promote peace and harmony. He abhors intolerance, a message that subtly but forcefully runs through his writings.

Emhecht grew up in Hungary and was educated in Budapest. He survived World War II, "but I was deeply affected by the atrocities against us Jews." He came to Canada after the Hungarian Revolution in 1956.

Emhecht developed an interest in art and music during childhood.

When he was 15, he saw a large panoramic work by19th-century painter Arpad Feszty titled The Taking of Hungary. He was so overwhelmed by what he saw that he went to a park and with his mandolin, in one sitting, he wrote an entire symphony titled Turanian Fantasia (The Hungarians).

It took more than 62 years before the symphony was premiered at a concert in Toronto sponsored by the Hungarian Embassy in 1998.

In 1999, it was performed by the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and in 2002 by Florida's Venice Symphony Orchestra (in a concert available on CD).

In their interview with The CJN, Emhecht and Schneid-Ofseyer recited one of her poems, titled The Mothers' Song. She also spoke about her father, who was killed by an axe-wielding Arab during the 1929 Arab massacres of Jews in Palestine, in which Miriam, then five, and her mother were both seriously injured.

She says that instead of having feelings of revenge, she thought more about how to make peace.

"I discovered that the people most interested in peace are the mothers because every enemy also has a mother who has the same feelings."

Both husband and wife have published books in English, Hebrew and Hungarian.

"Miriam is my inspiration. I'm the perspiration," Emhecht says.

Builder is new JNF president for Man./Sask.

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Over the past 25 years, Len Podheiser has built a successful residential and commercial property development and management company, one with properties across North America.

But in more recent years, the president of 400 Management Group has turned his attention to promoting the growth of the Jewish National Fund in Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

As the new JNF president for the two prairie provinces, he is looking forward to its annual Tu b'Shvat telethon next month and its gala dinner in June, the community's largest and best-attended annual fundraiser.

Podheiser began working with JNF 15 years ago. "I am a strong supporter of Israel," he said. "Working with the JNF was a way to help build the land of Israel."

He has served on other community boards in the past including the Combined Jewish Appeal, the local chapter of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, and the former Rosh Pina Synagogue (which merged with two other north Winnipeg congregations in 2002). In the latter role, he spearheaded the construction of a Jewish seniors' residence on shul property.

Podheiser will oversee the continued development of several new JNF initiatives, including the expansion of the JNF Business Club he helped form last year with Rami Kleinmann, the JNF shaliach for the region. It aims to reach out to non-Jewish businesspeople who are potential supporters of Israel.

"Through the club, we have formed strong links with the Italian community here and some evangelical Christians," Podheiser said. "We hold monthly luncheons and bring in interesting speakers, some political but most local business leaders."

The Jewish communities in Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton and Saskatoon are considering starting similar clubs, he said.

"It would be nice to have a meeting of all the western Canadian business clubs in Banff maybe to create a national organization," he says.

"Networking groups like this are common among businesspeople in the United States. In Canada, they haven't caught on to the same extent."

During his two-year tenure as JNF's regional president, Podheiser hopes to further develop links with other Jewish groups. In the past year, the JNF has combined with the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, the Asper Foundation and the Jewish War Veterans of Winnipeg, Gen. Moshe Dayan Branch, in joint programs.

"We also want to organize more joint missions to Israel," Podheiser said, suggesting a possible joint JNF/Jewish War Veterans mission to coincide with the dedication of a new park/meeting place outside an army base in the Negev that the two groups worked together to fund.

Podheiser will be going on a JNF leadership mission to Israel at the end of February.

Supporting the Moderates

In recent months, the rising toll of violence in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict has driven prominent moderates on both sides to seek a common basis for a peace agreement. These efforts have produced such documents as the Geneva Initiative and the Ayalon-Nusseibeh Principles. Neither document attempts to usurp the governmental prerogative to make treaties. Their intent, rather, is to demonstrate that there is a way out of the morass, that each side has a potential partner for peace.

The Ayalon-Nusseibeh Principles, reprinted below, were drafted by Ami Ayalon, the former head of Israel's Shin Bet security service, and Sari Nusseibeh, the former Jerusalem representative of the Palestine Liberation Organization. The document has since been signed by tens of thousands of Israelis and Palestinians and endorsed by key officials in the U.S. Administration.

The Ayalon-Nusseibeh Principles

1. Two states for two peoples: Both sides will declare that Palestine is the only state of the Palestinian people and Israel is the only state of the Jewish people.

2. Borders: Permanent borders between the two states will be agreed upon on the basis of the June 4, 1967 lines, UN resolutions, and the Arab peace initiative (known as the Saudi initiative).

• Border modifications will be based on an equitable and agreed-upon territorial exchange (1:1) in accordance with the vital needs of both sides, including security, territorial contiguity, and demographic considerations.

• The Palestinian State will have a connection between its two geographic areas, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

• After establishment of the agreed borders, no settlers will remain in the Palestinian State.

3. Jerusalem: Jerusalem will be an open city, the capital of two states. Freedom of religion and full access to holy sites will be guaranteed to all.

• Arab neighborhoods in Jerusalem will come under Palestinian sovereignty, Jewish neighborhoods under Israeli sovereignty.

• Neither side will exercise sovereignty over the holy places. The State of Palestine will be designated Guardian of al-Haram al-Sharif for the benefit of Muslims. Israel will be the Guardian of the Western Wall for the benefit of the Jewish people. The status quo on Christian holy sites will be maintained. No excavation will take place in or underneath the holy sites without mutual consent.

4. Right of return: Recognizing the suffering and the plight of the Palestinian refugees, the international community, Israel, and the Palestinian State will initiate and contribute to an international fund to compensate them.

• Palestinian refugees will return only to the State of Palestine; Jews will return only to the State of Israel.

• The international community will offer to compensate toward bettering the lot of those refugees willing to remain in their present country of residence, or who wish to immigrate to third-party countries.

5. The Palestinian State will be demilitarized and the international community will guarantee its security and independence.

6. End of conflict: Upon the full implementation of these principles, all claims on both sides and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict will end.

Sensitivity classes launched after anti-Semitic note published in college paper

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

The editor responsible for composing an anti-Semitic note in the Gargoyle, a University College newspaper at the University of Toronto, has voluntarily stepped down and a sensitivity training session was implemented for the remainder of the staff last week.

The constitution and editorial policies of the paper published by students at University College will also undergo extensive review, according to a press release issued jointly by the University of Toronto Hillel and the Gargoyle.

In addition to the sensitivity training for staff, an educational forum is being planned for University College students and newspaper staff, to offer students "an opportunity to participate in the creation of a clear mandate for the newspaper," said Johanna Herman, public relations co-ordinator for Hillel. The forum will be held in the University College Junior Common Room, Jan. 23 at noon.

Among the issues the newspaper will need to address is the fact that there was no real editor-in-chief. The first name listed on the editorial collective, Denice Delyle Stumpner, was a fictitious name, Herman said.

"This was somewhat disturbing since the editor-in-chief was supposed to represent the views of the board."

Other issues that may be discussed include the masthead's policy regarding submissions, which states: "The Gargoyle occasionally edits for spelling and grammar, but not for content unless it's very stupid, hateful, etc. Even then we actually don't."

Copies of the Nov. 21 newspaper were pulled off newsstands after two members of Hillel complained about the anti-Semitic slur. The paper agreed to stop publication until new guidelines were put in place. The next issue is due to appear Wednesday, Jan. 21.

Gargoyle editor Matt Draimin said, "The remark which appeared in the Nov. 21 issue… vulgar and unfit for print as it was, was not intended to be genuinely anti-Semitic." The comment was written in response to an article in which the appropriateness of a cartoon was questioned. The editorial note defended the cartoon and concluded with the slur.

Draimin said that "the Gargoyle has lost the confidence of the students at University College," and he hopes the forum scheduled for Jan. 23 will help to re-establish it.

Herman said she is pleased with the university's response. "They took our concerns very seriously," she said, adding she hopes the newspaper will follow through with its goals.

Saudi charm offensive: what's real and what's not?

Saudi Arabia is engaged in a major public relations campaign aimed at the West. The goal is to "correct" misperceptions about the kingdom's role in funding extremists and terrorists, promoting hatred of the West, and mistreating its female citizens.

The Jan. 13 National Post published an article titled "Saudis Launch News Channel to Convey 'A New Image,'" by Reuters reporter Dominic Evans. The new channel features the kingdom's first female news reader, which station director Mohammad Barayan says will "correct false perceptions" about the role of Saudi women. Barayan is also quoted as saying that the American media misrepresent Saudi Arabia by claiming, for instance, that the kingdom "is not fighting fundamentalists."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

But at the same time as the Reuters report appeared, the Guardian Weekly ran a story by Le Monde correspondent Mouna Naim about the continued repression of women in Saudi Arabia. While some latitude has been granted to women writers to express their views in the press, and, according to Naim, "possible reforms are under debate" in the kingdom, women still face overwhelming restrictions at the hands of the conservative clergy.

Writes Naim: "These women have virtually no rights; their every behaviour is strictly governed by rules imposed by men to guard their virtue" – a state of affairs taken to such a macabre level that on March 11, 2002, 15 Saudi girls died when they were forced to remain in their burning school building in Mecca because they were not wearing their head coverings and abayas (full-body robes).

Still, the Saudi PR offensive to affect "misperceptions" of its treatment of women – in addition to its role in promoting hatred of the West, and failing to stop the funding of extremists and terrorists – has kicked into high gear.

Even the New Republic, a highly respected U.S.-based, weekly review of politics that is well-known for its support of Israel and its criticism of the Saudi regime, carried a special advertising feature in its Nov. 3 issue. It contained the partial (four-page) transcript of a symposium held Oct. 2 in Washington, D.C., about political reform in Saudi Arabia. The New Republic co-sponsored the event with the Saudi government.

Of course, there should be impartial debate about reform in Saudi Arabia, but paid advertisements like this one are hardly unbiased. Despite surface appearances, it does not convey neutral information. The supplement could easily have been mistaken for a bona fide article, save for a small print disclaimer, "Special Advertising Section," on the top of each page, followed by a logo, "Sponsored by the People of Saudi Arabia: Allies Against Terrorism" on the final page. (The same issue also included a back-page advertisement paid for by the Saudis that featured a quote from CIA director George Tenet: "The Saudis are providing increasingly important support to our counter-terrorism efforts – from arrests to debriefing results.")

Editor Peter Beinart denied that such advertisements influence the magazine's editorial stance. In an interview published Oct. 10 in the Forward, he said: "The New Republic's positions on Saudi Arabia are crystal clear and will remain so… Anyone who thinks we will become an apologist for the Saudi government is just dreaming."

The challenge, then, for the mainstream media is to discern what is genuine reform in Saudi Arabia and what is simply public relations. It's clear the Saudis are intent on having it both ways. In the West they propound on the various ways they are determined to reform their society. But back home, there is very little evidence of any meaningful change.

Ottawa program builds ties between Jews and Somalis

By BALINT MOLNAR
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

OTTAWA — Ottawa's Jewish Family Services (JFS) is helping improve Muslim-Jewish relations in Canada's capital by mentoring a Somali community organization.

The partnership, which recently won an award from the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, is also helping shape Ottawa's emerging ethnic mosaic.

"North America is changing rapidly," says JFS director Mark Zarecki. "It's becoming more multi-ethnic, and one of the most important and fastest growing groups is Muslims."

Zarecki says Jewish communities are uniquely positioned to assist immigrants in their integration and community-building.

"We were immigrants once, too. Our experiences and knowledge are very valuable to newcomers," he says. "We can play the role of the bridge between new and established communities."

Ottawa's 18,000 Somalis constitute the city's largest Muslim group from a single country. There are about 60,000 Muslims in Ottawa, roughly one-tenth of the country's total Muslim population, according to the Ottawa Muslim Network, a non-profit information centre.

The Somalis are also among the city's newest and poorest immigrant communities. Most arrived between 1992 and 1994 from their war-ravaged national home.

They faced daunting challenges upon arrival. Most didn't speak either of Canada's official languages, and they struggled to find even menial jobs in a city hit hard by recession.

They also found themselves under the scrutiny of police and the media, with the community often depicted as a hotbed for idle youth drifting into gang-type violence, a relatively new phenomenon in Canada's sleepy capital.

The co-operation between JFS and Ottawa's Somali community dates back to 1994. That's when Abdi Karod, who immigrated to Canada in 1993 and today heads the Somali Centre for Family Services, or SCFS, persuaded some of his community's leaders to meet with Eileen Rabin, the JFS director at the time.

Rabin already had some contacts with individual Somali immigrants who had turned to JFS – which receives funding from the city of Ottawa and assists immigrants of any ethnic background – for help settling into their new home.

"It was an important meeting in terms of breaking down some initial barriers," Karod said. "Imagine: a Jewish woman sitting down with very traditional-minded Muslim males to discuss community-building."

Zarecki replaced Rabin in 1996, and the partnership between the two community organizations shifted into high gear.

In 1997, Zarecki helped SCFS craft a 10-year strategic plan. Today JFS handles the Somali centre's finances, assists with grant applications and channels charitable donations to SCFS through its own administrative framework.

The JFS name lends credibility to funding applications and new programs, and the organization's experience means SCFS didn't have to reinvent the wheel to lay its own foundations.

Both Karod and Zarecki say their collaboration has symbolic value that transcends specific programs.

A few years ago, Somali youth shouted anti-Semitic insults at a Jewish man on his way home from synagogue.

Now, however, with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict raging and the aftershocks of Sept. 11 making many non-Muslims suspicious of immigrants from the Islamic world, the collaboration between JFS and SCFS has won over skeptics in both communities.

> 'The majority of Somalis today look at Jews very differently than do other Muslim groups'

"We exemplify that there is no innate conflict between Jews and Muslims," says Zarecki, an Orthodox Jew. "Some people tend to forget this."

"Jewish communities also tend to be somewhat insular, or at least viewed as such, and our work sends a different message on both accounts," he says.

Karod agrees, noting that Zarecki always comes to SCFS' annual Youth Night event.

"Imagine him in his skullcap surrounded by 200 Muslim Somalis, laughing and having a great time," Karod says. "The majority of Somalis today look at Jews very differently than do other Muslim groups."

The difference is nowhere more important than among the young, who are considered more vulnerable to extremist ideas. Farah Aw Osman, SCFS' youth co-ordinator, says that while suspicion toward Jews still exists among young Somalis, it's mostly confined to a small group who embrace a more politicized view of their Muslim identity.

Riad Saloojee, executive director of the Canadian chapter of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, agrees that the community-to-community partnership is very significant.

"There have been some important contacts between the Muslim and Jewish communities on the leadership level," says Saloojee, referring to the regular meetings between Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa and the city's main imam. "This co-operation, however, is possibly even more important as it operates on the community level, directly benefiting members."

The Ottawa Jewish community's official leadership also has shown enthusiasm for the initiative.

Mitchell Bellman, executive director of the Ottawa Jewish Community Council, says misperceptions often prevent Jews and Muslims from co-operating.

"This is the case of an established and self-supportive community assisting another community, and people involved are aware that this benefits both sides," says Bellman, who says the project could serve as an example not only for other Jewish communities, but also to show the Canadian government how to promote inter-community relations.

Indeed, the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, an organization funded largely by the Canadian government, presented JFS with one of its annual $10,000 Excellence Awards earlier this year. The foundation stressed the "positive international ramifications" of the Jewish-Somali co-operation.

"This collaboration is a great model for others. It's a true partnership, without any patronizing overtones," says Karen Mock, executive director of the foundation.

But unease and mistrust do linger. One new JFS program – run by a Somali woman named Zahra – supports parents of autistic children. While JFS has ample room for meetings, some Muslim parents have expressed their discomfort about meeting in a "Jewish building."

Most people might be offended by such a blatant expression of prejudice, but Zarecki is empathetic.

"This is an issue of trust," he says. "It will be resolved in time, as these people put their suspicions and fears to rest."

Zarecki says he hopes the partnership will serve as a model for other Jewish communities looking to establish ties with other ethnic and religious groups, especially Muslims.

In March, Zarecki will speak about his work with the Somalis at the North American Jewish Family Services Conference in Cincinnati.

"I think Jewish communities can sensitize the broader society to be more responsive to minority needs, be it Jewish or other," he says.

Karod also believes the collaboration can have a ripple effect.

Zarecki "is a great ambassador for the Jewish community," Karod says. "Through his involvement, a large segment of Ottawa's Muslim population now has a very positive view of Jews."

Former CJC official moves to federal ministry

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The longtime national executive vice-president of Canadian Jewish Congress has shifted gears.

Jack Silverstone, who has helmed CJC at the national level and was its chief legal counsel for the past 18 years, has left the post to become chief of staff to Joe Volpe, the new federal minister of human resources and skills development.

Silverstone, 50, calls it a "temporary leave of absence" from his old job. "I'm still evaluating its duration."

Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director of community relations, will take over as interim executive VP of Congress.

"I have very high regard for Minister Volpe and I want to add some value to his position," Silverstone told The CJN.

Long considered a good and vocal friend of Israel and the Jewish community, Volpe was named to cabinet last month when Paul Martin became prime minister.

Volpe also became chief political minister for Ontario.

It will be Silverstone's task to ensure Volpe's office runs smoothly and that his boss's objectives are transmitted to the Liberal caucus, other MPs and the Prime Minister's Office.

Silverstone will also be responsible for staffing Volpe's office.

"It came up suddenly," he said of the post. "The minister contacted me and I said yes."

Under former former minister Jane Stewart, the ministry became embroiled in controversy over $1 billion in questionable grants.

Jack Silverstone

The ministry's mandate is to ensure Canada's labour force has up-to-date skills, and it works with non-governmental organizations in skills development.

"We will work to meet the challenges of the new economy," Silverstone said.

The ministry will also oversee the accreditation of professionals from outside Canada.

During Silverstone's tenure at CJC, it was involved in Canada's pursuit of alleged Nazi criminals in this country, ongoing Israel advocacy and a number of other issues.

Volpe was first elected in 1988 in the federal riding of Eglinton-Lawrence. He was parliamentary secretary to the minister of health from 1996 to 1998, and he chaired the House of Commons' standing committee on health from 1998 to 1999.

As well, he has been vice-chair of the Commons' standing committee on foreign affairs and international trade and chaired the Canada-China Parliamentary Friendship Group.

Jewish officials have noted that Martin's cabinet contains several ministers who have consistently spoken out for Israel, and could be the most pro-Israel cabinet in recent memory.

In addition to Volpe, others include Justice Minister Irwin Cotler; Senator Jack Austin, leader of the government in the Senate; Jacques Saada, leader of the government in the Commons and minister responsible for democratic reform; and Toronto-area MP Carolyn Bennett, minister of state for public health.

VOLPE AT BAYCREST: Joe Volpe, federal minister of human resources and skills development, right, visited the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care earlier this month to announce that the federal compassionate care benefit is now available for those eligible for Employment Insurance (EI). The benefit provides temporary income support for eligible workers who have obtained a medical certificate and take leave to care for or support a family member with a significant risk of death within six months. Joining Volpe was Baycrest president and CEO Stephen Herbert, centre, and Angelo Pesce, vice-president of human resources.

York University recognizes Hillel-backed slate

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Is the York University student election imbroglio finally over?

It appeared that was the case last Tuesday when the administration issued a statement saying it has recognized the November student government election results, in which candidates from Paul Cooper's "Progress Not Politics" (PNP) slate won 27 of 32 positions on York Federation of Students (YFS) Council, including all four executive positions.

But as of Monday morning, the YFS office was still closed to Cooper, and the old council was still refusing to formally ratify the slate and turn over the keys.

York representative Nancy White told The CJN Monday that discussions were still under way as to whether the incoming council had to be ratified, or whether the administration's decision is an adequate equivalent.

The situation is "very, very complicated," said Jordie Saperia, who won the position of faculty of arts councillor and who also serves as Hillel president.

"The York administration is treating us as the new student government," he said, noting that Cooper and some of his vice-presidents met with York president Lorna Marsden to discuss issues including parking and tuition.

But he said the PNP slate does not have an office, nor does it have financial control.

"It's almost like there are two councils right now – one which has the approval of York, and one that doesn't, and yet for some strange reason is still functioning."

The YFS bylaws "make it clear that there's no choice but to ratify [the PNP slate]," said Edward Prutschi, PNP's legal counsel.

"We take the view that what has occurred at this point is deemed ratification… As far as I'm concerned, Paul is the president."

Cooper, whose slate was backed by Hillel, promised to reorient YFS' focus toward student issues such as parking, security and tuition. The federation, Hillel charged, had become increasingly involved in supporting anti-Israel activities.

"The current process for resolving this dispute has fallen short of university standards for a responsible, orderly and democratic transition of student government," Bonnie Neuman, vice-president of students, said in last week's statement.

Ratification, usually a formality, was initially delayed by a YFS elections committee hearing on Dec. 4 to determine whether Cooper's campaign literature expenses violated campaign spending regulations.

Although the complaints were dismissed, ratification was delayed again at a Dec. 15 meeting of the outgoing YFS council because of allegations that a committee member was intimidated into abstaining on Dec. 4. The other three members voted in Cooper's favour.

New student gov't still frozen out

Early in January, Cooper's acquittal was overturned in a YFS council meeting.

Mike Novak, outgoing YFS president, chaired the original hearing. He told The CJN following the January meeting that the PNP "rightfully deserve to be in office."

His council has since turned against him, filing a notice to impeach him on Jan. 9, the same date the administration assumed financial trusteeship of the YFS and stopped transferring the money it collects from student levies on the council's behalf.

The YFS board also turned over its power to a constituency committee made up of York's individual college presidents, White said.

In a news release last Wednesday, the YFS expressed disappointment at the administration's "unilateral and illegitimate 'recognizing' of a new student council.

"The YFS believe the York University administration's actions to be unwarranted, misguided and potentially harmful to the student body at large."

The statement, which was distributed by Pablo Vivanco, the outgoing YFS vice-president of external affairs, called on the university to "immediately retract and allow for a proper and lawful completion of the constitutional process and transfer of power."

Efforts to reach the outgoing council for comment were unsuccessful.

New organization links Jewish campus groups

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — A new national Jewish student federation to promote Israel advocacy on campus and unite Jewish students across the country was created Jan. 11 at a weekend conference of Jewish student leaders here.

The new Canadian Federation of Jewish Students links some 30 Hillels and Jewish student associations, with the aim of making the Jewish voice stronger on Canadian campuses.

"This serves as a voice to the outside world," said Lance Davis, director of National Jewish Campus Life of United Israel Appeal Federations Canada.

Davis said the new federation is not a response to groups like Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, a pro-Palestinian group, which he said is communicating on a national level.

"We all recognize the importance of a very active political force. It will have more strength than any Hillel ever had," Davis said.

An earlier national Jewish students group, Network Canada, "lost steam and folded" in the '90s, he said.

The new initiative is the result of a recommendation from the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), whose mandate is to enhance the Jewish community's ability to promote pro-Israel activities while addressing the increase in domestic anti-Semitism.

CIJA now overseas policy, reviews budgets and coordinates resources for Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee and National Jewish Campus Life.

Davis said the new federation's goals are to share ideas and learn about difficulties across Canada, to serve as a forum to plan programs nationally, to create one voice that represents Jewish Canadian students and to create a body that can nominate leaders to represent students at international events such as World Union of Jewish Students conferences.

Muslim student associations in Canada are already linked under the North American-wide Muslim Student Associations of the United States and Canada, an organization created in 1963 to help students establish Muslim groups and Islamic programs on campus, Davis said.

In the same way, Campus Crusade for Christ, established in 1967, links evangelical Christian groups.

Canadian Federation of Jewish Students

Securing funding will help get the new Jewish organization rolling.

"We won't be funded until we have a thoughtful action plan," Davis said, adding that the federation is drafting an action plan to be used a fundraising tool.

"It's wonderful to be able to build a national Jewish student community," said the new federation's president, Alex Kemeny of McGill University.

Kemeny, who is also the president of Hillel Montreal, said his immediate goals are to link existing groups, develop a strategy for Israel advocacy and organize a national day of lobbying.

The federation will establish a board of directors with each campus Hillel or Jewish student association holding two seats. For campuses with large Jewish student populations, such as York University, the board will have one additional seat for each 1,000 Jewish students.

Although the federation is meant to link Jewish students from coast-to-coast, its first executive members are all from Southern Ontario and Montreal.

"Obviously we have concerns, but we feel confident about the people on the executive," said Brent Zachs, president of the Simon Fraser Jewish Student's Association. "As British Columbians, we are neglected, but here we are all equal."

Zachs said the new federation is not only about Israeli advocacy, but also about spreading Jewish culture and working towards getting kosher food on campus.

At the conference of Jewish student leaders in Ottawa, organized by National Jewish Campus Life for $20,000, the 32 delegates from across the country engaged in skill-building events. They also met with Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham.

Davis called the meeting "positive," but said the delegates brought the message that what happens abroad affects the local scene and that it's not easy being a Jewish student on campus.

There was formerly a national network of Jewish students called Network Canada, which, Davis said, folded in the '90s.

In addition to Kemeny, the new federation's executive includes vice-president internal Gary Diamond, from the University of Western Ontario; vice-president finance Dori Borshiov from York University; vice-president external Noah Joseph from Concordia University and program coordinator Sara Berger from Queen's University.

I came into the world at five pounds. I was overweight from there.

With a name like Pat, which rhymes with FAT, I was the brunt of cruel jokes. I had no friends. Never developed self-esteem.

The Diet Rollercoaster

I went on every crazy weight loss scheme. Tried the grapefruit, egg, special soup, all protein, all vegetable, only starch, high fiber and all fruit diets. Spent a fortune on tasteless prepackaged food. Went to support groups. Starved on diet shakes. I'd lose weight slowly, then quickly gain it back plus more. I was ashamed and embarrassed.

Instant Results

I was amazed by the change after my first hypnosis session. My brain got the message to zap my appetite. Hypnosis gave me instant control over my eating habits. My cravings came to a dead-halt stop. Binges dissolved. My confidence and self-esteem soared. My fat melted off at an average of 3.5 pounds a week.

I received so many benefits from hypnosis, I could write a book. No more headaches, cravings, binges, bloating or weight gain. I'm more confident at work. I feel alive, vibrant, active and energetic. I have never felt better, emotionally and physically.

Scholar Xu Xin promotes in Jewish Studies in China

In 1992, shortly after China established diplomatic relations with Israel, he founded the Center for Jewish Studies.

Xu, who studied Yiddish at Columbia University, is also president of the China Judaic Studies Association and editor-in-chief of the Chinese edition of the Encyclopedia Judaica.

Since 1995, he has written three books on Jewish themes – Legends of the Chinese Jews of Kaifeng, Anti-Semitism: How and Why, and The Jews of Kaifeng.

As well, Xu has organized a blizzard of conferences, exhibitions, workshops and lectures on Jewish topics, been a visiting professor at several American universities, given talks at Tel Aviv University and the Hebrew University, and served as a visiting scholar at Harvard University's Center for Jewish Studies. He has visited Israel four times since 1998.

The recipient of a 2002 Bar-Ilan University honorary doctorate, Xu said that Jewish studies in contemporary China emerged only after the death of Mao Zedong in 1976.

The post-Mao period coincided with China's drastic reform of its economy, its still ongoing campaign to modernize itself and its new receptivity to western influences.

Without these developments, he said in an interview, Jewish studies in China "would have been hard to imagine."

Until Mao's death, China was so preoccupied with its own affairs that the study of western subjects, including Jewish studies, was extremely limited.

Xu, who regards Jewish culture as a major source of western civilization, said that his centre offers regular courses on Jewish history and culture and the Holocaust.

At present, seven Nanjing University students are majoring in Jewish studies. Five are pursuing master's degrees and two are working toward PhDs.

But in the last 12 years, more than 2,000 students at Nanjing University – which has an enrollment of 20,000 – have taken elective courses offered by Xu and an assistant.

Two years ago, the centre invited 12 descendants of Kaifeng Jews to acquaint themselves with their heritage and learn Hebrew at a special three-week workshop.

The centre, whose Judaica library may well be the largest in China, is not unique in China.

Similar centres are found in cities such as Shanghai and Harbin, where Jews once lived in considerable numbers.

"Jewish studies in China are growing," said Xu, who was invited to Toronto by Sam and Esther Sarick, who take an interest in York University activities. "More and more people are jumping into the field."

Xu's centre also translates modern Hebrew literature and Zionist tracts into Mandarin. Publications include An Anthology of Modern Hebrew Short Stories and Ahad Ha'am.

In 1993, the centre launched an 800-page Chinese version of the Encyclopedia Judaica, which contains 1,600 entries.

More than 40 Chinese scholars participated in the project, and Xu wrote one-third of the entries.

"It's still the main reference work for Chinese to study Jewish subjects," said Xu.

If not for the support of foreign donors, many of his programs and projects might not have been possible, he said.

The centre has received more than $200,000 (US) from North American foundations, ranging from The Samuel Bronfman Foundation in Canada to The Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture in the United States.

Xu is currently trying to establish a Judaic studies foundation. Its objective would be to raise funds for research and Judaica libraries in China and to sponsor PhD students studying Jewish subjects at overseas universities.

Oberlander case

"Oberlander was only one step removed from the actual killing itself… People like Oberlander were the effective arm of the killing units. They couldn't have done anything without the Oberlanders."

Nevertheless, Matas said, "judges have other priorities than bringing to justice people involved in the Holocaust."

Morgan said an earlier concern of the Jewish community – that there was no political will to address Nazi war criminals – had been supplanted by courts that are putting up "judicial roadblocks."

"The Federal Court has had a problem and gotten itself tied up with procedural knots when it comes to well-funded litigants. You see it also in terrorism cases," he added, pointing to Mahmoud Mohammad Issa Mohammad, a Palestinian terrorist who murdered an Israeli airline passenger and who has lived in Canada since 1988.

A well-funded litigant with a good lawyer can challenge immigration proceedings for years, he said.

Morgan said he will recommend that Congress' officers approve a legal intervention should the case continue and be heard on the merits. Matas said B'nai Brith has not yet decided whether it will intervene.

Both said a new bill before parliament would put citizenship matters exclusively before the courts and exclude cabinet in citizenship decisions. However, they said the bill would only operate for prospective cases.

IDF increases anti-terror action in Gaza

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli army is stepping up anti-terror initiatives in the Gaza Strip in response to last week's terror attack at the Erez checkpoint that killed four Israelis. The army's actions will apparently include land operations and assassinations, and will be directed against Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

But Palestinian Authority officials Sunday warned Israel against the resumption of targeted killings, and denounced remarks made last Friday by Deputy Defence Minister Ze'ev Boim, who said that Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin is "marked for death."

Interviewed last weekend on Hamas' Internet site, Yassin said he was not directly involved in last week's terror strike at the Erez checkpoint. But the Hamas leader vowed that terror strikes will continue – and that leaders of the organization's military wing will determine the timing and locales of the attacks.

Speaking on Israel Radio last Friday, Boim warned that Yassin is "marked for death. He should hide deep underground. He won't know day from night. We'll find him in his tunnels, and eliminate him."

> 'Were Yassin really the main target, Boim wouldn't have made the statement'

Israeli army sources suggested Sunday that Boim's warning should not be taken literally as policy.

"Were Yassin really the main target, Boim wouldn't have made the statement," they said, adding that instead, assassination targets will be leading field operatives from the extremist Islamic organizations.

Nabil Abu Rudeineh, a spokesman for PA Chair Yasser Arafat, said that a resumption of targeted killings in the West Bank and Gaza Strip would escalate the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and the European Union last Friday called on Israel not to resume targeted killings.

"Proceeding in such a manner against a leading figure of a Palestinian terrorist organization would be counterproductive to efforts to achieve peace in the Middle East, as the European Union has expressed many times before," EU spokesman Diego Ojeda said.

In Washington, U.S. State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said Israel had a right to defend itself, but also should consider the consequences of its actions. He emphasized that the United States opposes targeted killings.

Reuters reported that Egypt Sunday described Israeli threats to kill Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin as illogical, illegal and inconsistent with a desire for peace.

"Much of what Israel does is not in line with any logic, nor any law nor any real desire to reach a settlement," Foreign Minister Ahmed Maher stated in response to Boim's threat.

The Israeli army opened the Erez crossing Sunday to Palestinian labourers and goods for the first time since last Wednesday's suicide bombing. Some 15,000 Gaza Strip residents will be allowed into Israel. The age of married men who are allowed to cross into Israel has been raised from 28 to 35. The Erez industrial zone also opened Monday, despite the damage caused to the terminal in the attack.

Israel Seals Gaza

Israel sealed off the Gaza Strip and may resume strikes against Hamas leaders after last week's suicide bombing at the Erez border crossing that killed four Israelis. Thousands of Palestinians from Gaza had been allowed to work in Israel following a lull in terrorism last fall, but a total blockade was reimposed after the Erez attack, which was claimed jointly by the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade and Hamas.

New Liberty Evidence

An examination of recently declassified U.S. intelligence documents reinforces Israel's claims that its deadly 1967 attack on the U.S.S. Liberty warship at the height of the Six-Day War was a mistake, a U.S. State Department conference on the war heard last week. Among other revelations, National Security Agency historian David Hatch said intercepts of a conversation between Israel's Air Force command and two helicopter pilots "suggest strongly that the Israeli attackers did not know they were aiming deadly fire at a vessel belonging to the United States," though they don't provide absolute proof.

Historic Deflation

For the first time, Israel's annual consumer price index (CPI) was negative, at -1.9 per cent for 2003. The key reasons were a decline in demand due to recession, high unemployment, a drop in public sector pay and relatively high interest rates.

Mob Crackdown

The Police Intelligence Branch has compiled a list of 860 suspects in organized crime rings. A new plan to crack down on organized crime aims to arrest at least 25 per cent of them a year until the problem is solved.

Terror Victims Sue

Israeli relatives of victims of a December 2001 terrorist attack at Jerusalem's Ben Yehuda promenade that killed 11 people are suing the Palestinian Authority for $55 million (US). They claim PA officials financed the attack. In a related development, the Supreme Court is set to decide if the Jerusalem District Court can judge claims against the Palestinian Authority.

Reunion in Libya?

Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi reportedly will allow dozens of Jews who immigrated to Israel to return for a school reunion. Ma'ariv last week quoted Rafael Luzon, a graduate of a church-run school in Bengazi, Libya, as saying he received official permission for all alumni to attend this year's reunion on condition their birthplace is noted in their passport. He said several officials in Tripoli told him they saw the visit as key to a rapprochement with Israel.

Israel winds down Ministry of Religious Affairs

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — The imminent closure of the Israeli Ministry of Religious Affairs will conclude a process that began three years ago when the government approved a motion to dismantle it.

In September 2000, Dei'ah veDibur, a weekly haredi newspaper, reported that then-prime minister Ehud Barak said the move was "the first step towards the realization of his social-civil reform" and stressed the "step was being taken for reasons of efficiency and economy."

Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein also advised Barak at the time to close the ministry because "its activities bordered on the limits of legality."

In either case, the January 2003 election, which reduced the religious parties' representation and doubled the number of MKs from Shinui – a party that ran on an anti-haredi platform and favours a clearer separation of religion and state – provided the impetus for the government to finally complete the ministry's closure.

The current plan is to transfer all its departments to other ministries.

For the past few months, Meir Spigler, the current managing director in charge of dismantling the ministry, has been working hard to ensure that as many departments as possible get moved as working units.

However, some will be divided, he said. For example, the office that deals with minority religions will be split between the ministry of the interior and the ministry of housing.

Spigler said that while the media have reported on the corruption and nepotism that existed in the past, the public is less aware that conditions have improved significantly over the past two years.

"Efforts were made to bring the ministry out of the dark ages," he told The CJN.

"All those found guilty of corruption were dismissed and inefficient workers were fired wherever possible. Previously, there were many more employees than necessary and the office was filled with rabbis' children."

Meir Spigler

Members of the religious parties, which largely controlled the ministry, displayed a complete lack of concern for the secular world, Spigler said.

"They grounded El Al on Saturdays. They tried to prevent businesses from operating on Saturdays. No one wants religion forced on them and resentment built up."

Departments to be moved to other gov't areas

Secular Israelis began to hate hearing any reference to religion, he said.

Since then, Spigler said, "the entire culture of the office has changed. The workers now understand that the purpose of the ministry is to support Israeli citizens."

Over the past two years, the ministry found ways to work around religious rules so that citizens can decide for themselves how observant they want to be, said Spigler, who considers himself a secular Jew.

He knows that Israelis resent the haredi exemption from the army and the application of the Tal Law, passed last year, which allows yeshiva students to defer army service until age 23 to encourage them to get work experience as an alternative to Torah study.

The media focused on these issues, Spigler said, adding that the public's view was based on the perception that yeshiva students weren't working particularly hard or making personal sacrifices.

"Those guys really do study in a way that most people couldn't," Spigler said. "And in the end, they finish without any diploma that can help them get jobs with decent incomes. I think most of us would not choose to do it."

In addition, Spigler pointed out that the recent intifadah has been aimed at all Israelis, putting haredim at as much risk as anyone else.

Spigler, who has degrees in both engineering and law, also set up a computer operating system that monitors all money received and released from the ministry.

It is now almost impossible for yeshivot to receive funds for fictitious students, which some have have been accused of doing in the past, Spigler said. The records of each student are checked with six government departments – education, labour, interior, national insurance, taxation and the border patrol – to ensure that every student is accounted for. Spot checks are carried out to ensure that the number of students registered at yeshivot corresponds with office records.

There is still a long way to go, Spigler said. For example, funds for the construction and renovation of synagogues and mikvot must be more effectively monitored. However, these issues will now become the responsibility of other ministries.

Spigler, who will move to the Prime Minister's Office, is unsure what will happen after the ministry is dismantled.

Some Israelis are hoping that its various units will eventually be disbanded after they are integrated into other ministries. Others are praying that after the next election, a new coalition government will put the pieces back together again.

Israeli envoy summoned to Swedish Foreign Ministry

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

STOCKHOLM — Israel's ambassador to Sweden, Zvi Mazel, was not reprimanded Monday by the Swedish Foreign Ministry, but he was asked for details of the incident last Friday after he vandalized an art exhibit depicting a Palestinian suicide bomber as Snow White.

Mazel unplugged the spotlights around an exhibit by former Israeli Dror Feiler, now a Swedish citizen, and his Swedish wife Gunilla. Mazel was also caught on videotape shoving one of the spotlights into a pool filled with red-coloured liquid on which a boat floated with a picture of Hanadi Jaradat, who killed 22 Israelis when she blew herself up in the Maxim restaurant in Haifa in October last year.

The Feilers, as well as Swedish officials, say the installation was meant to condemn terrorism.

But Mazel, supported by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, said the artwork glorified suicide bombers, and complained about the fact that it was part of an exhibition accompanying an international conference on genocide that was to be held Monday at the Stockholm museum. Mazel said this violated a prior agreement with the Israeli government that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would not be part of the conference.

Officials in Jerusalem asked for a conciliatory statement by Sweden, to enable the Israeli delegation to attend the conference as planned.

Despite statements of support from Sharon and others, diplomatic sources in Jerusalem said Sunday they worry that in an effort to defend the government's policies toward the Palestinians, Israeli diplomats are adopting unconventional methods of protest that could harm the reputation of Israeli diplomats.

Germany arrests 86-year-old over Nazi massacre in 1945

Ha'aretz
Daily Newspaper Ltd.

MUNICH — Germany arrested an 86-year-old man on Monday who is accused of leading a Nazi massacre in a Slovak village in 1945.

Prosecutors in the southern city of Munich said a district court issued an arrest order to hold the German, identified only as Ladislav N.

Investigators say he commanded a special German anti-insurgency unit fighting Czechoslovak partisans. The unit is accused of slaughtering 146 civilians including 70 women and 51 children in a reprisal in the closing months of the war.

He is also accused of ordering the shooting of 18 Jewish civilians who were discovered in their hiding places at Ksina in February 1945.

In 1962, a court in the former Czechoslovakia convicted the suspect of those and other killings in his absence, Munich prosecutors said.

Munich prosecutors said they began investigating in 2001 after the Slovak government approached them about the man's case. German prosecutors reviewed archives and court documents in the Czech Republic and Slovakia, and they attended the questioning of witnesses as part of their investigation.

Despite the 59 years that have passed, European prosecutors are still compiling files from World War II and collecting eyewitness evidence. Unlike normal crimes, there is no limitation on the prosecution of crimes against humanity.

Sharon: route of fence to change

It will also consider changing the route of portions that have not yet been built in response to several petitions against the barrier, according to the government's planned submission to the High Court of Justice.

Sharon said Sunday that the experience to date with the fence has been both "good and bad:" It has been successful in preventing terror attacks, but "unsatisfactory in the harm it does to Palestinians' daily lives.

"It could be that additional thought is needed about the possibility of changing the route, which will reduce the costs of operating the fence without damaging security," he said.

Sharon also cited the "difficult opinion" on the subject submitted by acting Attorney General Edna Arbel, in which she said she would have trouble defending portions of the fence's route to the High Court.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, in contrast, opposes any change in the fence's route. "I am capable of defending every centimetre of the current route and showing why it is necessary to defend Israel's citizens," he told the meeting.

However, he added, he is aware of the humanitarian problems the fence has caused, and has decided to set up a special body within the defence establishment to deal with "all the humanitarian issues arising from the fence's construction."

Defence establishment sources said their impression is that Sharon, in response to growing legal and political pressure, is considering purely tactical changes to the route, not a "strategic change" such as eliminating places where the fence extends into the West Bank and building it exclusively along Israel's pre-1967 border.

His office said Sharon has yet to decide whether to make changes, but is willing to consider the subject.

At a meeting of senior ministers to discuss Israel's response to next month's ICJ hearing, Justice Minister Tommy Lapid got into a disagreement with Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom and Sharon's bureau chief, Dov Weisglass.

Lapid proposed that Israel present a detailed argument in favour of the fence, saying the court hearing will be "a battle for international public opinion," and therefore Israel must make its case plain.

"People will be making arguments against us, and what we don't say [in response] will not be said," Lapid said.

This will be the band's second CD, and it will mix many types of music – Eastern European, funk, bluegrass, and of course, klezmer.

Beyond the Pale was formed five years ago and features Eric Stein on mandolin and cimbalom, Martin van de Ven on clarinet, Bogdan Djukic on violin, Milos Popovic on accordion and Bret Higgins on bass.

> 'Performing live is nothing like performing in a studio'

This live album comes three years after their debut studio album Routes.

"Performing live is nothing like performing in a studio," Stein says. "In the studio, everything is absolutely perfect, but on stage, there's more of a ragged energy involved. We absorb the excitement of the audience. It's almost like they become part of the band."

The set will mix traditional melodies and original compositions. This allows the band to express their own unique sound and still be accessible to their very diverse audience, which consists of fans of all ages and cultures.

The concert will feature Josh Dolgin as guest vocalist. He has performed with the band numerous times before, singing (and rapping!) in English and Yiddish. He has also been known to do a magic trick or two on stage.

Tickets are $15 for adults, $12 for students, and can be bought in advance by calling Central Box Office 416-504-PLAY, or by ordering online at www.torontobox office.ca.

The CD will be released in the spring, but they will be pre-sold at these shows at a discount. For more information check out www.beyondthepale.net

Classic Russian opera to be performed in concert

By SVETLANA BARKAN
Special to The CJN

Many opera companies have recently found ways to make operas exciting, captivating and contemporary. Foreign-language operas have English subtitles and look more like Broadway musicals, than performances for a limited audience.

Opera in Concert is presenting its 30th anniversary season production of The Tsar's Bride, by Nikolai Andreevich Rimsky-Korsakov, on Feb. 1, 2004, at 2:30 p.m. at the St. Lawrence Centre's Jane Mallett Theatre in downtown Toronto.

The Tsar's Bride will be performed in Russian with English subtitles and stars soprano Marina Shemesh.

Rimsky-Korsakov has been defined by many Russian and world musical encyclopedias as one of the three most influential Russian composers of the 19th century. The other two are Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky and Modest Mussorgsky, whose musical creations caused a revolution in Russia's music-writing circles.

The plot of the The Tsar's Bride provides a close look at the Russian court during the reign of Ivan the Terrible.

Marfa, a daughter of an aristocrat, is chosen as a prospective bride for the raging tsar. Meanwhile, her rival, Lyubasha, is kidnapped and dishonoured by Gryaznov, the tsar's devoted oprichnik. The oprichniks were a cruel and bloodthirsty group of men who were the backbone of Ivan's power as tsar.

The cast of The Tsar's Bride includes many performers whose national heritage embraces the musical culture and language of Russia.

"We are privileged to have among us artists who can do justice to the work," says Opera in Concert general director Guillermo Silva-Marin. "I'm sure the performance will be stirring and authentic."

The soprano is planning to become a cantor and is studying at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

> The Tsar's Bride provides a close look at Russian court during reign of Ivan the Terrible

She was born in Leningrad (now St. Petersburg) and completed her musical education at the Rimsky-Korsakov Institute of Music. Shemesh and her husband later immigrated to Israel.

Shemesh has been with the New Israeli Opera for several years. She was a part of the chorus, and when a singer with a small, yet complicated part got sick, she was asked to perform the role. She agreed, and she learned the entire part in a day!

Her big break came when The New Israeli Opera assigned her the part of The First Lady in its original production of The Little Magic Flute, an interpretation of Mozart's The Magic Flute. Performed in Hebrew, the opera was made to look like a computer game come alive to attract a younger audience.

Shemesh and her family came to Toronto in 1998, and she became a part of Beth Tzedec Synagogue choir. There she met the late Cantor Paul Kagansky, who inspired her to pursue a career in cantorial singing. During her stay in Toronto, she participated in the Canadian Opera Choir and travelled to Vancouver to perform in a Vancouver Opera Company production.

Her recent performances include a leading role in the world premiere of The Challenge of the Muse by Samuel Adler at Avery Fisher Hall at the Lincoln Centre in New York City. The production also featured Alberto Mizrahi as a leading tenor.

Also in the cast of The Tsar's Bride are mezzo-soprano Margaret Maye as Lubasha and debuting bass Nikolay Cherkasov as Sobakin, Marfa's father. Tenor Keith Klassen, also a debuting artist, sings the role of Lykov, and Michael Meraw returns to Opera in Concert in the role of the evil Gryaznov.

The choral scenes will be in the hands of Robert Cooper, leading the renowned Opera in Concert chorus. The pianist and Opera in Concert music director is Raisa Nakhmanovich, who was one of the organizers of "Soviet & Kosher: 100 years of Jewish culture in Russia." She is a music professor at York University and a graduate of the Latvia State University of Music.

Opera in Concert concentrates on introducing its audience to rarely performed operas. Their presentation, said Nakhmanovich, is unique because the opera takes place "in concert," which means there are no sets or elaborate costumes. The action is limited, but that allows the audience to concentrate on the vocal experience and the expression of the voice, she added.

For tickets, call 416-366-7723 or 1-800-708-6754, or look online at www.stlc.com.

Powerful paintings grew out of lawyer's grief

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

After his father's funeral, Simon Schneiderman spent a lot of time thinking about his father Yoel, a Holocaust survivor.

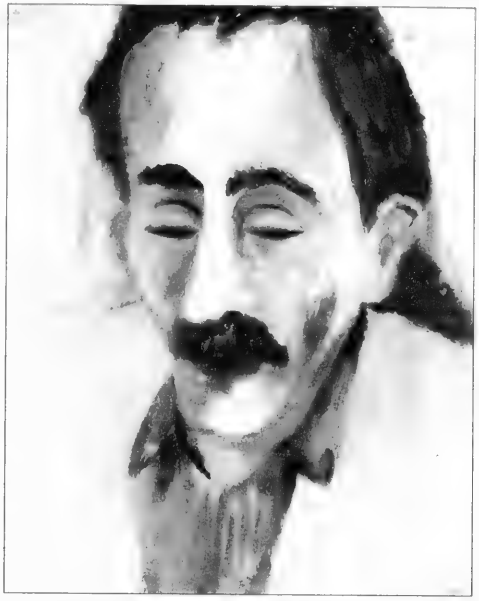
This preoccupation resulted in his completing, in a few months, a series of paintings about his father's life and death.

The powerful paintings that grew out of Schneiderman's grief are included in his current show, "Preoccupied With My Father."

"I didn't know I was going to do a show until I saw the volume of painting," he says.

Along with the paintings in the exhibit, completed after his father's death in 2002, are some drawings Schneiderman did before his father's death. A portrait of his father in the hospital during his last days is based on sketches he made at the hospital.

Looking back at the intense and emotional time in which he produced the bulk of the show, Schneiderman, 56, says that working on the paintings was a cathartic experience. "You don't see it at the time but know later by the persistence you're doing it, churning out the paintings."



"Preoccupied With My Father," an exhibition by Simon Schneiderman is on view until Feb. 6.

"Preoccupied With My Father" is the story of one man, Yoel Schneiderman, born in Warsaw in 1906, or "Joel" as he was known in Canada. But as much as the show is about Yoel, it is also about living, loving, working, tragedy and suffering, aging – several paintings are set in a Montreal retirement home and in a hospital – and dying.

The show can be seen in terms of the Holocaust and the drawings and paintings can be divided into pre-Holocaust, Holocaust era and post-Holocaust works. "The Holocaust gives context to my father and how he turned out," Schneiderman says.

The paintings are expressionistic in style, raw, emotional and vivid and some of the drawings have those qualities as well. The paintings and drawings are accompanied with text, including family history, poems – in Yiddish and English – and letters. Together, the pictures and the words pack a punch.

A remarkable painting of the Holocaust period, and the gateway into the next era, post-Holocaust, is one of Yoel, Simon and his mother, Genia, dressed formally and standing beside suitcases. Images of Jewish grave stones, ocean liners and the sun are in the background.

"Wed in a DP camp, my parents arrived in Halifax with only one surviving child. The ship was the Proteu and it was December 23, 1951," says the accompanying text.

The post-Holocaust works in the exhibit are mainly of Yoel's final years, the funeral and the shivah.

Schneiderman's drawing of Yoel's 1994 mugging evokes the terror Yoel must have felt. The accompanying text reveals that "he survived with his gait hobbled but his voice strong."

We learn from the text beside a painting of two frail elderly men, one using a walker and one with canes, of Schneiderman's parents moving to a retirement home, Castel Royale.

Beside a portrait of some of the retirement-home residents is a letter from Yoel to Simon, gently complaining that Castel Royale is too far from the Jewish Public Library and other Jewish community organizations and he has nothing to do.

"His problem in the geriatric ward was too much lucidity," we learn from the text accompanying a series of paintings of Yoel and others in the impersonal setting of the hospital. "He was 95 and looking in vain to discuss world politics."

The text accompanying the final portrait of Yoel, lying in a hospital bed, tells us that he passed away on Tisha b'Av.

"My father died on the saddest day of the Jewish calendar. This would have pleased him."

"Preoccupied With My Father" is a strong show with some moving and memorable paintings, drawings and text, and well worth seeing.

To view Scheiderman's earlier work, a collection of drawings and paintings based on the law, visit the website www.simonschneiderman.com.

A lawyer, Schneiderman is also the creator of the National Film Board animated series, Understanding the Law.

"Preoccupied With My Father" is on at the To Go Café, 1133 Yonge Street, until Feb. 6.

YORK STUDENT PRESENTS DAVID FRENCH'S SALT-WATER MOON

Mitchell Marcus, a 21-year-old York University student and Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto graduate, is producing David French's well-known play Salt-Water Moon and taking on the lead role of Jacob Mercer. A Thornhill resident, Marcus has been acting professionally since the age of 12, and is producing the play for a curriculum credit at York.

Set in Newfoundland in 1926, Salt-Water Moon tells the story of Mercer's attempt to win back Mary Snow, the girl he left one year earlier. The much-lauded play, which premiered at the Tarragon Theatre 20 years ago, features "two of the most stubborn yet wonderful characters ever written [who] spend an evening arguing, manipulating, hurting and falling deeper in love with each other.

"Although not a Jewish play, the chutzpah of the characters is powerful," Marcus comments. Bethany Jillard plays the female lead and Harvey Levkoe directs. Names in the News: Dr. George Bernstein, a surgeon who at 78 still maintains an office practice four days a week in Windsor, Ont., is a well-published writer of short stories and poems.

Bernstein laments that "the hospital takes away your scalpel at age 65 and rewards you with the title senior surgical consultant." But just as he continues to practise medicine, he also continues to write "because Susie made me promise that I would." He lost his wife Susana in 2002.

The Windsor physician recently published a poetry chapbook titled Unfinished Symphony in Red and Black, and has prepared a book of short stories (The Day I Struck Out Joe DiMaggio) and a book of essays (The Second Career) for publication in 2004.

Passages: Fraydele Oysher, a star of the Yiddish theatre, died Jan. 5 in Manhattan, the New York Times reported. She was 90.

Born in Lipkon, Bessarabia, in 1913, Oysher began her career as a child actress at a theatre just across the Brooklyn Bridge, where she was making $18 a week. "I went there one day and there was a big crowd standing outside. Just my luck, I thought. It's a fire and I'll be out of work. I asked somebody what was going on and he said, 'There's a little girl that sings here,' and the crowd was waiting to buy tickets. 'That's me,' I said, and I went in and asked for a $2 raise."

Soon she was charming audiences in Yiddish theatres on Second Avenue on the Lower East Side, and taking top billing in musicals written especially for her, such as The Little Queen, The Golden Girl and Fraydele's Wedding.

She fit perfectly into one of the Yiddish theatre's favourite plot devices – a yeshiva boy who is revealed to be a girl – long before Barbra Streisand took on the role of Yentl. "I was cute, I was flat and I was a terrific piece of work," she once explained.

The daughter of a cantor, she became one of the first women to sing cantorial music on stage and often performed with her husband, opera singer Harold Sternberg. Her brother Moishe was also a cantor as well as a major star in Yiddish theatre and films. She is survived by a daughter, singer-comedian Marilyn Michaels, and son Michael Sternberg.

Evangelical Christians very pro-Israel, author contends

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Special to The CJN

Though Christian opinions of Israel vary widely, Paul Charles Merkley believes that evangelical Christians, most of whom are Christian Zionists, have been its most steadfast friends.

He makes this claim in Christian Attitudes towards the State of Israel (McGill-Queen's University Press).

A professor emeritus of history at Carleton University, Merkley contends that theologically conservative Christians have, in general, been the most pro-Israel of all Christians.

Important scriptural reasons aside, they have lined up behind Israel basically because they admire its democratic system and have full and unimpeded access to Israel's Christian holy places.

Writing from a Christian Zionist viewpoint, he suggests that while Roman Catholic and Protestant denominations essentially were hostile to Israel after its emergence as a sovereign state, evangelical Christians remained consistently loyal.

Before 1948, he adds, Protestant missionary societies were in the forefront of the opposition to Israel's establishment.

Merkley maintains that while liberal Christians tend to dwell on the fate of the Palestinians, evangelicals "have rejoiced" over Israel's survival.

There are, of course, exceptions. Merkley cites mainstream Catholic and Protestant clergymen who have rallied to Israel's side in times of distress, and Christian fundamentalists who are patently anti-Zionist.

As a rule, though, he is skeptical of the attitude of mainstream churches toward Israel.

On the eve of the Six Day War, he notes, American Jewish leaders were unable to persuade either the (Protestant) National Council of Churches or the National Conference of Catholic Bishops to issue a straightforward declaration of support for Israel's fundamental right to exist.

For evangelical Christians, biblical prophecy lies at the heart of their attachment to Israel.

As Nelson Bell, Billy Graham's father-in-law, put it: "That for the first time in more than 2,000 years Jerusalem is now completely in the hands of the Jews gives the student of the Bible a thrill and a renewed faith in the accuracy and validity of the Bible."

Be that as it may, Jews should remember that the flip side of biblical prophecy is the desire of some evangelical Christians to convert Jews.

Citing Israeli scholar Yaakov Ariel, Merkley acknowledges that messianic Jews – Jews who have formally converted to Christianity – form the fastest-growing Christian community in Israel.

This book, though informative and well-meaning, suffers from at least two flaws.

There are too many digressions, such as Mohammed the Prophet's relations with the Jewish community and Yasser Arafat's supposedly real intentions toward Israel. These diversions impede the flow of the narrative.

It would have been better had Merkley stuck closely to the subject at hand.

And all too often, this volume reads like an evangelical polemic.

Nevertheless, Christian Attitudes towards the State of Israel is an interesting addition to the literature of Israel and Christianity.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have been experiencing constipation for a while now and am tired of the full feeling. I do not like taking laxatives. Is there a dietary solution that you can recommend?

A. You want to consider three things when it comes to constipation.

- What foods should be added to your diet;
- Which foods should be limited; and
- Are you allowing yourself time to go.

I'll first address the last issue as it is very significant and a major cause of constipation for many busy people. It is essential that you take five-10 minutes at the same time each day, to sit in the bathroom and allow yourself to actually have a bowel movement, or at least to teach your body that this is the time it can go. Many people frequently ignore the feeling of having to go to the bathroom because they are busy.

You can add many things to your diet that will assist you with regularity. I find that different things work for different people, so I'll list popular ones and you can try what most appeals to you. Whole grains are essential, such as whole grain breads, high-fibre cereals, brown rice, whole wheat pasta, legumes, fresh fruit and vegetables, as well as dried fruit and nuts. But dried fruit and nuts have a lot of calories so limit their portions. Hot drinks can also be effective, as is one tablespoon ground or milled flaxseed per day – I have yet to see a patient that this hasn't worked for. You can add flaxseed to cereal, yogurt, salad or tuna, or you can put it on toast or in muffins.

Keep in mind not to overdo the addition of fibre. You should be consuming about 25 grams per day (a hefty amount, as you'll learn when you begin reading the fibre content of foods on labels), but you should add it gradually to avoid bloating and gas. If you are increasing your intake of high-fibre foods, make sure to increase you fluid intake as well, especially with high-fibre cereals, as they require significant fluids to be most effective.

Also consider if there are constipating foods in your diet such as a lot of dairy, bananas or white rice. Constipated people should not eliminate dairy from their diet altogether as it has many health benefits, but you may want to reduce it slightly while correcting the problem. The over-consumption of dairy is frequently the cause for constipation in children who consume excessive milk, more than two cups (16 ounces) per day.

Book offers 'secret to retirement happiness'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Retirement should be looked upon as a career that develops and progresses rather than a time to quit work, says sociologist Alan Roadburg.

The key, he says, is to figure out what particular satisfactions you got from work – power, friendship or routine, for instance – and replace it with something that will serve the same purpose.

So convinced is Roadburg of this philosophy, that he wrote a book, Re-tire with a dash; the secret to retirement happiness, UTD Library Publications, 2003.

The hyphen in "re-tire" is not a spelling mistake. "I prefer to say that it's like getting a new set of wheels on your car – you are ready to go, even better than you were before," he says.

Roadburg, who earned his PhD in sociology at the University of Edinburgh, was a professor at Dalhousie University and now leads workshops on retirement in Toronto, did a major research study on the sociology of work. It found that "the main problem people experience in retirement isn't income or health. It's boredom."

Money, he says, doesn't guarantee happiness. "We all know people who are well off who are thoroughly miserable, and similarly, others who have just enough are quite content with their lot."

In the same way, Roadburg says, a successful retirement has nothing to do with health. "That's a myth started in the 1950s by people in the health professions, and it has been perpetuated. Health is just as important to a 14-year-old [as it is to the elderly]," he says.

The key, he says, is flexibility. For instance, suppose you have a plan in place for your retirement and find that you can't afford it. There are two options, the traditional one, to increase your financial worth by continuing to work, making riskier investments or selling your assets ; or, if you don't want to do those things, "adjust. Recognize that if you can't do A, then do B."

The reason people enjoy doing something, Roadburg says, is that it satisfies their needs, and therefore, the focus has to be on how to accomplish that.

As an example, your goal might be to go mountain climbing, but you are in poor health. You might realize that what you are really after is the challenge of mountain climbing and that you can get the same satisfaction from teaching photography to inner-city children.

Roadburg recommends avoiding concentrating on stereotypical activities. Some people, he says, are happy to do volunteer work; others can't stand the idea.

The book is written in an informal, anecdotal style, making its points easily accessible. It includes a workbook that you can go through alone or with a group. Sections deal with identifying needs and skills, evaluating and developing plans, creating activities together with other people and even working, if one chooses to do so.

Re-tire with a dash is available in major bookstores. Roadburg can be reached by e-mail alanr@re-tire.net.

Wallenberg exhibit opens in Toronto

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

A temporary exhibit on the life of Raoul Wallenberg opened Sunday in downtown Toronto.

Located in the lobby of the Royal Bank tower on Bay Street, the exhibit consists of a series of panels detailing Wallenberg's life and his success in saving the lives of more than 100,000 Hungarian Jews during the last months of World War II.

Calling him a "symbol of justice and humanity," diplomats from Israel, the United States and Hungary praised Wallenberg's accomplishments and courage at the opening ceremony.

"Wallenberg reminds us that we don't choose our trials, but we choose how to respond to them," said American Consul General Antoinette Marwitz. "Raoul Wallenberg will always be a shining example of good that can come out of evil."

Keynote speaker Irwin Cotler, Canadian Justice Minister and member of Parliament for Mount Royal, delivered a speech on the need to overcome indifference and silence and stand up to evil.

Irwin Cotler, Canadian Justice Minister and MP for Mount Royal, at the opening of an exhibit in downtown Toronto for Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg. "If we had had 10 Raoul Wallenbergs then it would have been a different world." [Elysse Zarek photo]

"Wallenberg saved more Jews than any government. He was the embodiment of the talmudic idiom that he who saves a single life is as though he has saved a universe," said Cotler.

In Budapest, Wallenberg set up a series of safe houses and proclaimed them Swedish territory. Tens of thousands of Jews were hidden in these safe houses. Cotler compared Wallenberg's safe houses to the United Nations' attempts to set up protective havens during the Balkans conflict in 1995.

"We learn the importance of how one person alone can confront hatred and prevail," Cotler said. "If we had had 10 Raoul Wallenbergs, then it would have been a different world."

Wallenberg was a Swedish diplomat stationed in Budapest in 1944. He saved more than 100,000 Hungarian Jews by issuing diplomatic passes – called a schutzpass – that entitled the bearers to the protection of the Swedish government. Wallenberg also stopped Nazi plans to liquidate the Jewish ghettos in Budapest by personally threatening a top Nazi official, thus saving about 70,000 lives, and he distributed food, medicine and Swedish diplomatic passes on the Nazis' forced marches. The diplomatic passes carried no weight in international law, but they were enough to convince the Nazis not to harm the people who held them.

The last time Wallenberg was seen was in 1945, when he was captured by the Soviet army in Budapest and accused of spying for the United States. There are conflicting reports of his death. Soviet diplomats claimed that Wallenberg died of heart attack in his prison cell in 1947; others allege that he was shot by the KGB. However, Soviet prisoners have testified that Wallenberg was alive much later. No outside reports have confirmed his death. Wallenberg would be 91 years old if he were alive today.

The exhibit's opening was timed to coincide with Raoul Wallenberg Day on Jan. 17. Then-minister of heritage Sheila Copps proclaimed Raoul Wallenberg Day in 2001.

Wallenberg has been given honorary citizenship in a number of countries, including Canada, Israel and the United States. Canada declared him an honorary citizen in 1985. The only other person to have received honorary Canadian citizenship is Nelson Mandela.

The Raoul Wallenberg exhibit, which is sponsored by Norshield Financial Group and the Raoul Wallenberg International Movement for Humanity, is on display until Jan. 31 in the south tower lobby of the Royal Bank building, 200 Bay St.

Ex-pro looks forward to life after hockey

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Jamie Sokolsky is ready to say goodbye to the hockey world, but he's enjoying one final season on the ice before officially calling it a career.

"This will be it," says the 26-year-old defenceman with the country's fourth-ranked University of Western Ontario Mustangs. "I actually retired before coming to business school and made the adjustment last year when I decided to move on with my life outside of hockey. It's definitely a challenge. [Playing hockey is] all I ever did growing up."

Sokolsky will slide into his first job in the real world next spring at an investment bank in Toronto, after finishing his MBA at the University of Western Ontario's Richard Ivey School of Business. In the meantime, he'll try to help the Mustangs win a national championship.

Through the season's first half, Western sat atop the Ontario University Athletics' (OUA) Far West Division standings with a 10-2 mark, one point up on Lakehead. Sokolsky had four goals and five assists as part of the league's leading offence, which had already scored 83 times.

The six-foot-two, 210-pound blueliner would likely still be playing professionally if not for a potentially career-ending injury he suffered a couple of years ago while with the Long Beach Ice Dogs of the East Coast Hockey League (ECHL). At the time, he took a cross-check to the back of the neck and lost some feeling in his hands.

During a two-week absence from the lineup, he was told he might not be able to play again. He decided at once to apply to business school, following up on an economics degree he earned from the University of Waterloo through correspondence courses.

But the injury – a bruised nerve – didn't turn out to be serious and Sokolsky came back to finish the season. He didn't give much more thought about returning to school until the summer when his acceptance letter arrived in the mail.

"I always planned to have a career beyond hockey," said Sokolsky, a sixth-round draft pick of the Philadelphia Flyers in 1995. "When I was told my neck injury might have been it, it definitely accelerated my decision. If you would have asked me a couple years ago, I never thought I'd be retiring at 25."

Sokolsky spent five years in the ECHL, beginning his pro career in 1997 with the New Orleans Brass. He also spent time with the Huntington Blizzard and Greensboro Generals before playing his final season in Long Beach, where he was named the league's most outstanding defenceman and a first team all-star while leading league defencemen in scoring.

Before turning pro, the Richmond Hill native had a stellar junior career with the Newmarket Royals, Belleville Bulls and Owen Sound Platers. In 1996, the Platers named Sokolsky their best defenceman, most valuable player and scholastic player of the year. That year, he was also an Ontario Hockey League all-star.

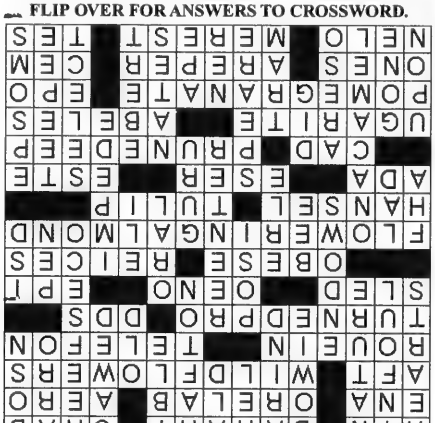
Sokolsky made his first-ever trip to Israel in 1997 and helped lead Canada to a gold medal triumph at the Maccabiah Games while being named the tournament's most outstanding defenceman.

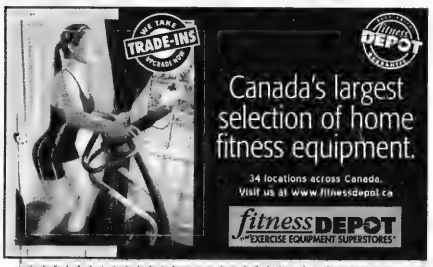
The most horrifying hockey experience Sokolsky encountered came during a six-month stint in the Russian Super League a couple of years ago. While training in Bulgaria, a 15-year veteran was threatened he'd be cut unless he got into shape. During a daily morning six-mile run through the forest, the veteran collapsed and died two days later in hospital.

There's been nothing quite so grueling this year for Sokolsky, but doing his master's degree and playing hockey at the same time has certainly been no walk in the park. In a few months time, he'll join the working world.

"The transition is kind of exciting," he said."I've never worked before in a conventional sense, but I've always had [an] interest in the financial markets. It's a good time to move on."

FLIP OVER FOR ANSWERS TO CROSSWORD.





Israeli fencer allowed to enter Jordan tournament

By YOAV BOROVICH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

AQABA, Jordan — In what was likely the most closely watched sporting event of his career, Israeli fencer Tomer Orr traded thrusts and parries with competitors in the Jordanian port city of Aqaba.

"There has never been such a festival surrounding me and I think that even if I do well in the Olympics, the attention I attract will be nothing like this," 25-year-old Orr said moments after officially signing up for the Fencing World Cup foil games.

The organizers of the event had practically begged the chair of the Israeli Fencing Association, Vladimir Sklar, not to insist on sending Israeli fencers to take part. Sklar, surprised and angry, launched a lobbying blitz and enlisted, among others, top Israeli officials and the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League.

"Senior politicians and even the royal palace were involved" in the decision to finally approve Israel taking part, said Khaled Atiyat, the chair of the Jordanian Fencing Federation (JFF).

"I would personally like to see the Israelis inside, but most members of the federation are concerned that your participation will seriously hurt the competition," Atiyat told the Israelis prior to the competition.

Initially, the JFF refused to allow Israeli fencers to take part in the five-day event, which attracted athletes from 32 countries in the Middle East, Asia, Europe, North and South America. Tournament results go toward qualifying for the Olympics.

"Arab countries taking part in the competition have no diplomatic relations with Israel and they reject its participation," Atiyat had told Associated Press. "I don't want my tournament to be jeopardized by an Arab boycott."

Orr, the reluctant hero in this tale, had an exhausting day before the competition even began. It started with a media frenzy surrounding his signing up, followed by a ceremonial raising of the Israeli flag after it was found it had not been included among the other 32 flags of participating nations.

"We'll allow you to raise the flag, but you'll have to do it yourselves," organizers told the Israeli delegation. The "ceremony" was attended by Orr, Sklar and some journalists.

Once in the competition hall, Orr seemed uncomfortable with the scrutiny of other athletes – the Iranian delegates in particular looked like they had seen a ghost.

"I see nothing wrong with sport being affected by politics," said the head of the Iranian delegafion, Mohammed Izar Barghouti, who thought he was speaking with a Canadian rather than an Israeli reporter.

Asked why Iran refused to compete against Israel, despite agreeing to play against the United States in the 1998 World Cup, he said: "It's very simple. We recognize the fact that a country named the United States exists. Israel, on the other hand, is an entity that does not exist. For us, it is called occupied Palestine."

Perhaps the Palestinian delegation heard the Iranian's remarks – it was the only delegation to leave the prestigious competition because of Israel's presence. Algeria, Egypt, Jordan and Morocco all took part.

Honey Sesame Dump Chicken

- 4-8 pieces of chicken
- 1/2 cup beer
- 3 tblsp. sesame seeds
- 3 tblsp. honey
- 2 tblsp. Dijon mustard
- 1/2 tsp. pepper
- 2 cloves crushed garlic

It's called "DUMP CHICKEN" because you DUMP the mix into a freezer baggie with the chicken and freeze it. Then when you want to eat it, you thaw overnight in the fridge and DUMP it into a pan and cook it!

To cook the chicken, thaw completely in the fridge, dump into 9"x12" pan, bake at 350°F until done. For breasts, cook 25-35 minutes. For chicken pieces, cook 1 hour. Serves 4 to 8. Recipe courtesy of Jewish Food Archives something

By MIRIAM PORTER

Two weeks ago, I arrived in Israel for the first time. In my dreamland fantasy that played in my head throughout the flight, I arrived in Ben-Gurion Airport looking well-rested and happy. A group of handsome Israeli soldiers were waiting to greet me and we all sang Hatikvah together. White and blue flowers were put in my hair and fresh juicy pomegranates were generously placed in my outstretched hands.

In reality, I arrived at Ben-Gurion exhausted, lost, confused and scared. I had difficulty reading and speaking Hebrew (despite the Hebrew class I recently completed), my cellphone was broken, I had to convert my loonies and toonies into shekels and I was being overcharged by cab drivers. When you are alone in a foreign country, all the little difficulties become big obstacles, and it is stressful and frustrating.

Luckily, a few days later, I realized I wasn't alone and that I was the foreigner, but the country wasn't foreign.

Miraculously, a fellow Torontonian who made aliyah two years earlier found me and started showing me the way of life in Israel. I began to understand the maps, the currency, the bus systems and the language (when spoken slowly without an accent).

Once I settled in, I appreciated where I was.

Everything I had ever learned about Zionism and the history of this beautiful country came flooding back. I spent Shabbat in the Old City, where I sang and danced on a rooftop overlooking the Kotel. I watched hundreds of yeshiva scholars march arm in arm as they welcomed in Shabbat with beautiful songs. I ate dinner with a generous family I had not met until that evening. Sometimes the family has 40 people over for a meal, many of them complete strangers. This type of generosity can be found everywhere in Jerusalem.

The following day, I walked through the historical streets of the Old City's Jewish Quarter. Every Jerusalem stone has its own special story. Each corner represents another side to the amazing struggle and triumph the Jews have experienced. I learned the detailed history of the Temple Mount, Zion Gate, the Tower of David and the underground tunnels of the Kotel. I stood on the same stones as my ancestors and thought about what they fought for and how lucky I am to be in Jerusalem.

As Shabbat came to an end and I held a burning Havdalah candle, I realized that the reality of Israel far surpasses any fantasy I could ever come up with.

May Israel have peace.

Two new war crimes cases launched

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Justice Department announced last week it is preparing to file court documents that will begin the lengthy process of removing citizenship from two Nazi war crimes suspects.

The two suspects have already been served with legal notice of the ministry's intention to strip them of their citizenship, but both have asked that their cases be referred to the Federal Court, according to Lynn Lovett, deputy director of the department's crimes against humanity and war crimes unit.

Lovett declined to offer further details about the suspects, their places of residence or what they are alleged to have done to warrant loss of citizenship. She would only say the minister alleges they obtained Canadian citizenship through fraudulent means.

The announcement of the two cases marks the first new development in the Nazi-era war crimes file in years, and brings the total number of Nazi-era war crimes cases, either before the courts, pending or awaiting ministerial action, to nine.

Canadian youths serve in IDF

Motivated by Zionist ideals, love of Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

While most Canadians his age are attending university or studying in a yeshiva, 19-year-old Yakov Frydman-Kohl has joined a radically different educational program.

Frydman-Kohl is attending tank school at an Israeli army base somewhere near the West Bank town of Jericho. He recently completed a course in advanced training before his first deployment somewhere in the Gaza Strip.

He's been in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) for about 10 months. Prior to that, he studied in a yeshiva near Be'er Sheva called Yerucham. His unit of Mergach 6B tanks, U.S.-built Pattons that Israel has upgraded with their own fire-control systems, consists of yeshiva students who are serving in the army through its hesder program, which combines military duty with religious study.

Unlike his Israeli comrades, Frydman-Kohl is one of the chayalim bodedim, soldiers without family in Israel. A graduate of Yeshivat Or Chaim high school for boys in Toronto, Frydman-Kohl and 17 classmates (out of 19 graduates) travelled to Israel to study at a variety of yeshivas for a year. Many Or Chaim graduates pursue that path, Frydman-Kohl said, but his class boasted inordinately large numbers. What's more, 10 stayed on for a second year of study while five enlisted in the IDF.

His classmates – Binyamin Kleinman, Yossi Mersky, Ari Wexler and Eliav Danziger – are all in various stages of military training. Kleinman and Mersky are in the tank corps while Wexler and Danziger are completing advanced training in an infantry unit.

Frydman-Kohl, the gunner in his tank's three-man complement, said his decision to join the army was made gradually. When he and his classmates came to Israel, the question of enlisting came up frequently in their weekend get-togethers during the school year.

The News in Brief

Canada

Grant to Givat Haviva

OTTAWA — The government of Canada has given $110,000 to the women's centre at Givat Haviva, an education and research complex near Hadera, Israel, that fosters research and community work on peace, democracy, and coexistence between Arabs and Jews, Canada's ambassador to Israel, Donald Sinclair, announced in Israel last week. "It is a Canadian tradition to invest in efforts promote peace," he said.

Passion Preview

WINNIPEG — Some 1,100 Christians from different denominations recently got a sneak peek at The Passion of Christ, a film directed by actor and conservative Roman Catholic Mel Gibson. The Jan. 15 invitation-only showing at Winnipeg's Grant Memorial Baptist Church was put on by the Campus Crusade for Christ. The film, which opens Feb. 25 – Ash Wednesday on the Christian calendar – has received criticism from Jewish and non-Jewish scholars, based on leaked scripts, for suggesting Jews were responsible for Jesus' death. Media were barred from the screening.

Zundel's Bid Denied

TORONTO — A Federal Court judge ruled last week that neo-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel represents a security threat and will remain in jail until another court can determine his fate. Judge Pierre Blais rejected Zundel's contention that his detention was unconstitutional. Blais said national security reasons prevent him from giving details about the grounds for his decision.

World

Embassy Asked to Move

STOCKHOLM — The Israeli Embassy in Sweden will have to relocate after the ambassador attacked an art exhibit depicting a Palestinian suicide bomber. Ambassador Zvi Mazel said last week he and his staff have been asked to vacate the building where the embassy has been housed for almost 50 years. The landlord cited fears that other residents could be at risk following Mazel's attack earlier this month on a Stockholm art exhibit depicting an Islamic Jihad suicide bomber floating on the blood of her Israeli victims. Meanwhile, the museum is pulling promotional posters for the artwork, but is letting the artwork itself remain on display.

Speakers Attack Jews

PARIS — Muslim speakers at a Jan. 17 rally here against legislation to ban Islamic scarves in public schools attacked Jews and Israel. Speaking to 15,000 protesters, Mohamed Latreche, head of the Party of French Muslims, described Zionism as "an apartheid ideology that we should fight like we fight Nazism." He also attacked President Jacques Chirac, saying he does "everything for Jews, but nothing for Muslims," and described leading French daily Le Monde as "a Zionist paper controlled by LICRA," a respected anti-racist group that has many Jewish members.

Van, Shul Targeted

STRASBOURG — A van used as a school bus by a Jewish school here was firebombed last week in what has been called an apparent anti-Semitic attack, local police said. The van was attacked before dawn last Monday, 24 hours after unidentified assailants pelted a nearby synagogue with stones during the night, police said. There was no sign who was behind the two incidents.

Teen Attacked

PARIS — A Jewish teenager was injured in an attack by Muslim youths at an ice-skating rink near Paris. On Jan. 17, a group of youths shouted anti-Semitic insults at the 15-year old boy before kicking him in the head and jaw with ice skates, the Bureau for Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism said in a statement. Police detained four youths aged 14 to 17 who were described as being of North African origin.

Sign Rejected: Oy Vey!

NEW YORK — New York has rejected a road sign reading "Leaving Brooklyn: Oy Vey!" The city's transportation department rejected the request for the sign made by Brooklyn borough president Marty Markowitz. The city said the sign would be more distracting than helpful for motorists leaving Brooklyn for Manhattan on the Williamsburg Bridge, Associated Press reported. The city also rejected a sign reading "Leaving Brooklyn: Fuhgeddaboudit!" at another city bridge.

Jailhouse Kosher

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — Florida prisons may soon be offering a kosher dining option. The state's Department of Corrections has asked the governor for an extra $1.9 million (US) to cover the cost of providing kosher meals, the Orlando Sun-Sentinel reported. A kosher meal costs about five times as much to prepare as a standard one, but the state says it's making the change because it eventually may be required to by law. Only one Florida inmate currently gets kosher meals, a convicted murderer who was born Jewish and became Orthodox in jail. For years, Florida has had special dietary options for Muslims, diabetics and vegetarians.

Anti-Semitic Incidents Up in Holland

AMSTERDAM — The number of anti-Semitic acts in Holland increased significantly in 2002, but few were serious, according to a report released earlier this month.

Written by researchers at the University of Leiden and the Anne Frank Foundation in Amsterdam, the report also noted a decrease in violence against Muslim targets. But anti-Semitic incidents rose to 60 in 2002, up from 41 in 2001. About half were related to soccer games.

The researchers found immigrant youths were less involved in anti-Semitic attacks – they were responsible for about 20 per cent in 2001, but just five per cent in 2002, with most carried out by non-Muslim Dutch at anti-Israel protests.

The Jewish community didn't react to the report, but representatives have called its methodology flawed, saying it doesn't include incidents at school, where many Jews think anti-Semitism is becoming a problem. Experts also say there are likely more incidents, as most go unreported to police.

Most incidents in the report are not very serious, the researchers said. Apart from shouts at soccer games, Jewish groups occasionally receive threatening mail, pro-Palestinian protesters often make anti-Jewish statements, and anti-Semitism can be found on some Dutch websites. But there were also nine cases of physical harassment, such as beatings of visibly Jewish people.

ROM hopes to display Jewish artifacts from China

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

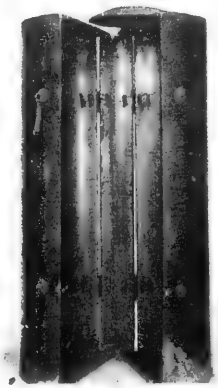
The rare artifacts of an exotic and extinct Jewish community in Kaifeng, China, are scattered far and wide in museums and universities around the world.

"All that's left of this community are these objects," said Sara Irwin, the Far Eastern collection manager at the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto.

The ROM has 11 of these prized Chinese Jewish artifacts, which range from a striking lacquered Torah case to a weathered limestone bowl.

The remaining items can be found at such far-flung institutions as the Municipal Museum in Kaifeng, Oxford University in Britain and Hebrew Union College and the New York Public Library in the United States.

The ROM's Chinese Jewish collection – the only one of its kind in Canada – is expected to be showcased at its Asian galleries when they reopen next December. Currently, the artifacts are in storage during the museum's major renovation project.



A Torah case

"There is hope that some of the artifacts will be displayed again," Irwin said. "We'll try our level best to have a representation of Kaifeng Jews at the museum."

Bought by Bishop William Charles White, a Canadian Anglican missionary who lived in China from 1897 to 1934 and who died in 1960, they were originally housed in Kaifeng's only synagogue.

Destroyed several times by fire and flood, and then rebuilt, the synagogue gradually fell into disuse and ruin as the Jews of Kaifeng lost their Jewish identity through assimilation.

Jewish merchants from Iran, Afghanistan and India reached Kaifeng via the Silk Road more than 1,000 years ago. At the emperor's invitation, they established what became China's only permanent pre-modern Jewish community.

By the early 20th century, few of Kaifeng's original Jewish inhabitants, who resembled Chinese people in terms of physical appearance, considered themselves Jewish.

"When Bishop White arrived in Kaifeng in 1910, the last rabbi had been dead for over 100 years, the synagogue had been demolished and all the Torah scrolls had been sold or had disappeared," Irwin has written.

A stone bowl

"However, there was still a loosely knit group of families who were aware of their Jewish ancestry," she added.

ROM acquired the artifacts between 1920 and 1931, long after Bishop White purchased them.

The uncompromising imperative

We couldn't breathe; it was as if we had absorbed a punch to the solar plexus. The heart spilled its broken shards into our disbelieving mind and for a terrible, tearful moment, we could not function. The news of the Columbia's failed landing was such a blow that it debilitated.

But ultimately, the debility yielded – as it must – to life's uncompromising imperative: to live, to move forward, to advance.

For most of us who shared a sense of peoplehood with Ilan Ramon, his death was a deep tragedy. One of Israel's fallen sons, he was a man of great values, courage and humanity and an exemplar of his country's high achievements.

For his immediate family and narrow band of close, familial friends who shared their love with him, Ramon's death was immeasurably cruel, an inexplicable, now permanent, tear in the order of their lives.

We have assembled a small montage of photographs on the Perspectives page as a modest tribute to the mission and the bravery of Ilan Ramon and his Columbia crew colleagues.

The plaque reads: In Memoriam/ To the crew of Space Shuttle Columbia/ STS-107, Feb. 1, 2003. Rick Husband/ William C. McCool/ Michael P. Anderson/ Kalpana Chawla/ David M. Brown/ Laurel B. Clark/ Ilan Ramon. (A small Israeli flag appears beside Ramon's name.)

As a reminder of the fuller dimension of the human being that Col. Ilan Ramon was, I reproduce a small excerpt about him from the news story that appeared in The CJN last year, Feb. 6.

"Ramon, whose mother and grandmother survived the Holocaust, brought onto the space shuttle, a small pencil drawing titled Moon Landscape by Peter Ginz, a 14-year-old killed in Auschwitz.

"He also had a tiny Torah scroll a 13-year-old boy received in Bergen-Belsen from the rabbi of Amsterdam in order to study for his bar mitzvah… In addition, Ramon packed a credit-card-sized microfiche of the Bible given to him by President Moshe Katsav, as well as some mezuzot…

"Ramon was not religious, but asked to eat kosher food in orbit – the first time it was ever placed on a space mission.

"'I'm secular in my background, but I'm going to respect all kinds of Jews all over the world,'" Ramon said. "'For Israel and for the Jewish community, it's a very symbolic event.'

"In a conversation [from outer space] with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon…, Ramon said, 'Israel looks from here just like it does on the map, small but charming… We have a wonderful people, and it is very important to preserve our heritage.'"

We can all learn a great deal about our own relationship to our people and the world by reflecting upon the important messages Ramon tried to convey. May Ilan Ramon's memory be for blessing.

This past Sunday, the minister of Diaspora affairs, Natan Sharansky, and Jewish Agency for Israel chair, Sallai Meridor, the heads of Israel's Forum for Countering Anti-Semitism reported that there was a slight decrease in the number of reported anti-Semitic incidents last year, but a significant rise in the severity of individual anti-Semitic attacks around the world.

"Anti-Semitism poses… a strategic threat, and the response to it must be strategic and global and a joint effort of the Jewish people and the state of Israel," Meridor said.

Earlier this month, with the diplomatic "incident" surrounding the offensive art display in Stockholm, we saw poignant evidence of the poisoned European atmosphere that increasing anti-Semitism has wrought there.

Some European governments, however – notably in Germany, Italy and France – appear determined to try to counteract the ominous rising tide. They have all publicly declared that they will do battle against anti-Semitism in their respective countries. They have also prevailed on the European Union to reschedule the cancelled conference on anti-Semitism that was to be held this month. The conference is now rescheduled, for Feb. 19.

The proof of their resolve, of course, will be in the actions they take and not in the good intentions they proclaim.

One of the most important research publications on the subject of anti-Semitism is a monthly bulletin called Post-Holocaust and Ant-Semitism, co-published by Dore Gold and Manfred Gerstenfeld of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs. It is an excellent source of information and commentary.

For information about the centre and the bulletin, one can call the Jerusalem number 02-561-9281 or fax 02-561-9112 or e-mail jcpa@netvision.net.il. The centre's website is: www.jcpa.org.

We should all join the battle against anti-Semitism, and being as well informed as we can be is an important first step.

U.S. push for global democracy needed: Frum

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to the CJN

If the "neo-conservative" suit fits, journalist and political commentator David Frum will wear it, he told a crowd of 400 at Holy Blossom Temple on Jan. 12.

"I don't feel like a neo-conservative," said the former White House speechwriter for U.S. President George W. Bush, but after being labelled one for years, he admitted, "I am one."

Frum's talk, "An End to Evil: How to Win the War on Terror," was his second Holy Blossom event in a little over a year, and coincided with the release of his book by the same name, co-written with Richard Perle, a man Frum credits with the post-9/11 Bush mantra: "Hold accountable not only terrorists, but all regimes that support and harbour terrorism."

> Goal connected with world peace

Despite this policy, which Frum refers to as the "Magna Carta of the war on terror," he said that by last spring, the spirit of Sept. 11 had begun to flag noticeably. With the "status quo re-establishing itself," he and Perle wrote their book to announce to the world that "the fight is not over."

Experts on terrorism, Frum said, generally devote most of their attention to the origins of terror, and give far less space or time to "the question any person of passion would ask: 'What do we do?'"

Without attempting to summarize his 300-page book in a 45-minute talk, Frum, son of Canadian broadcast personality the late Barbara Frum, outlined its four themes: commitment to the war at home and to the one abroad, the advocacy of American ideals and the need for institutional reform.

Institutional reform is crucial in the fight against terror, said Frum, who holds degrees from Yale University and Harvard Law School.

"Wars are fought by governments and bureaucracies," he said, but added that many of these institutions have outlived their usefulness.

"Mere completion of their mission doesn't stop bureaucracies from doing their work," he joked.

He spoke of a Cold War mentality that still pervades the CIA, and of the United Nations as a "horrible Kabuki theatre," where the same dramas are continually and uselessly re-enacted. This is "not merely ugly amusement," he said. It is downright dangerous to a future of peace.

The UN's charter must be amended to strongly condemn nations that harbour terrorism, he said. Otherwise, it "has chosen its own irrelevance" through corrupt and self-defeating policy. And it's up to democratic countries such as the United States to withdraw from such outdated institutions as the UN in order to make their protest heard.

Democracy is vital, Frum said, despite global opinion that argues we should focus on building stability, not democracy. Non-democratic systems are inherently unstable and one-man rule is particularly unstable, "even when the one man is our friend."

The spread of democracy, he said, would usher in a "world governed not by violence or the threat of violence, but by law." Before 1914, violence was the primary rule for nations and governments. Since 1945, thanks to the "achievements of our parents and grandparents," a portion of mankind enjoys a degree of lawfulness.

Rather than view U.S. attempts to spread democracy as a form of American expansionism, Frum said, we should concentrate on creating a "global community of equals."

But that equality would be partial, he suggested, pointing out that the global community necessarily relies on its most powerful member. At the moment, the world's most powerful country is the United States, but in the past, it was the United Kingdom, and in the future, it could be any nation, even one now under oppressive rule.

It's not just a matter of U.S. empire-building. "No one is talking about imposing U.S. power," he said.

Frum believes the push for global democracy is connected with the goal of world peace, which is for him a distinct and immediate possibility.

"It has already come true for about one-fifth of humanity," he said.

Former PLO member threatened for Zionist views

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Walid Shoebat, a Palestinian born in Bethlehem, is under threat from his own people.

A one-time member of the PLO who instigated riots and attempted to bomb a Bank Leumi in Bethlehem, Shoebat is now an outspoken critic of the Palestinians' use of terror against Israel.

Shoebat, a Muslim-turned-Evangelical Christian, denounced the anti-Israel rhetoric propagated by the Palestinian Authority and championed Zionism during a live taping last week of the radio program Let's Talk Peace, hosted by the Tovia Singer Show, at the University of Toronto.

"God promised that he would not allow the Israeli people to be put out of their land," Shoebat said to an audience of mostly students.

In an interview before the show, Shoebat said, "The Palestinian problem was a wedge created to divide Israel and conquer it… We as Arabs used to always accuse the British and the West of dividing and conquering. Who is dividing and conquering now?"

These dissenting views have made Shoebat a target. He has been threatened by those who view him as a traitor, including members of his own family.

The 43-year-old computer programmer, who moved to the United States at 19 and now lives in northern California, had to sell his house and move after his brother phoned his wife and said, "Tell your filthy husband not to forget we know what he's doing and don't forget we know where he lives."

Shoebat's transformation from a PLO terrorist to a Jew-loving Christian began when he tried to convert his Catholic wife to Islam. Reluctant to undergo the conversion, his wife asked him to produce evidence of the corruption that Shoebat alleged was present in the Bible. Shoebat spent six months studying the Bible, documenting his thoughts, questioning his beliefs and eventually abandoning Islam in favour of Christianity.

He renounced his past and became a fervent supporter of Zionism while espousing the view that certain strains of Islam inspire violence among Muslims. He has been spreading this message in churches and through media interviews in the United States, England and Ireland. His appearance at the University of Toronto campus to participate in the Tovia Singer Show, hosted by New York-based Rabbi Tovia Singer, marked his first visit to Canada. The event was co-sponsored by the Canadian Zionist Federation and Betar-Tagar, an international Zionist youth organization.

The courage to speak out has not been without a cost. Shoebat has been labelled a collaborator by his people.

"Every day when I look in the mirror, I see my people looking at me and spitting and cursing," he said. "Every night I can't sleep."

Born to a Muslim father and a Christian mother who converted to Islam upon marriage, Shoebat grew up in an environment where Jews were demonized and the use of terrorism was glorified. The indoctrination began with hateful children's songs and continued throughout his schooling.

"In my mind, the Jews were evil people," Shoebat said, adding that he had been taught Jews were "the sons of monkeys and pigs." He said he was instructed to throw stones at rabbis during Friday sermons at the mosque he attended.

"This is what they teach in the entire Middle East, this is what they teach in the mosques," he said.

Influenced by these teachings, Shoebat instigated riots and even attempted to murder an Israeli soldier. He likened the indoctrination he received during his childhood to Nazi-era propaganda.

"The Jew was dehumanized to the point that you thought you were doing God a favour by destroying the Jew," he said.

Shoebat didn't speak to a Jew until he was 18. A year later, he moved to the United States, where he continued to support the PLO until he eventually began the journey of self-examination and introspection that led to his rejection of terrorism.

Shoebat is sorry for the actions he committed in the past.

"Confession is the beginning of healing – one should confess their sins," he told the audience. "To confess is to ask for redemption."

Rabbi Tovia Singer, left, talking with Muslim-turned-Evangelical Christian Walid Shoebat.

Reflecting on what he would say now to the Israeli soldier he attempted to murder as a teenager, Shoebat said he would tell him: "Please understand that the true occupation was the brainwashing of us children to hate the Jews. We were occupied by this hatred. Please understand that this is the reality of the Middle East and this is the reality of the Palestinian situation.

"I would ask him for forgiveness."

The Tovia Singer Show is heard on Israel National Radio and is also broadcast around the world via the Internet. You can hear the Walid Shoebat interview by accessing the show's website at www.toviasingershow.com.

Hot potato project aims to keep homeless warm

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Iris Halbert, a Toronto mother of six, is out to prove that warming the homeless is as easy as baking a potato.

She's on a mission to give a warm baked potato to every homeless person in the city.

Her "hot potato tikun olam project" was conceived, she says, after she saw a homeless man shivering near Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue.

Halbert, who has two children at Netivot HaTorah Hebrew Day School, says she often gives homeless people some Netivot HaTorah "money" to buy food, but wanted to find a way to give them some warmth.

"I remembered a story I heard when I was a child. People in Europe used to keep potatoes on the coals all night, and then in the morning, they would wrap up the potatoes and stuff them in their pockets. They would feel the warmth from these potatoes for hours."

She test-baked some potatoes and discovered that they could stay warm for about five hours. Then she approached Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

"I called Ve'ahavta and asked if they would help distribute to the homeless baked potatoes wrapped in a bag and then wrapped in a sock.

Iris Halbert, left and Netivot HaTorah teacher Sherrie Diamond are seen with students who decorated potato bags to be distributed to homeless people in the city.

"It did not take much convincing. As a trial run, we baked 60 potatoes, and had them distributed from the Ve'ahavta and Native Men's Residence [Na Me Res] Street Help Van.

"The potatoes warm up their sleeping bags, and then the next day, they – a good source of vitamins, potassium and fibre – can be eaten."

The idea is "so simple and elegant" she says, that local media picked up the story. It appeared on Toronto 1 Television, CFRB Radio, CTV National News and its local affiliate CFTO/CTV, City TV's City*Pulse*, as well as in several newspapers.

"When the Prince Edward Island Potato Board heard what we were doing, they donated 125,000 potatoes. We showed them that potatoes can be mobile heat for the homeless. The potatoes can actually save lives."

The word has spread quickly. McGregor Socks has donated about one million pair of socks to the project, a distribution centre has been set up and people are baking potatoes all over the city.

The "logistics of delivering all the potatoes is being worked out," Halbert says.

Naftali, Halbert's 11-year-old son, helped make deliveries along with his five siblings.

"People were amazed at how long the potatoes stayed warm. One man told me the potatoes helped his sore shoulders.

"When we went to Na Me Res, I saw a container of potatoes steaming with heat. I realized then how they could keep people warm," he says.

Netivot HaTorah Grade 6 teacher Sherrie Diamond got her students involved in the project by having them decorate potato bags.

"We wanted to give them something that would warm up the people up and brighten their day," Diamond says.

Shoni Harel, a student in her class, adds, "We want to try and rehumanize" them.

The homeless issue is complex and always under debate, Diamond says, but "while people are debating, Iris did something simple and tangible. She reached out to the people and helped."

For her part, Halbert says, "we all felt so disappointed and powerless" after 9/11. "By taking part in the potato project, we are sending out a reminder that we are in control. We can make things better.

"The kids also learned how we can take an idea and follow it through."

Canada can lead in this battle

The upcoming visit by United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan to Ottawa to address the Canadian Parliament will be a propitious opportunity for Prime Minister Paul Martin to press the case for the international criminalization of suicide bombing as a crime against humanity.

Two weeks ago, Rabbi Abraham Cooper, the associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center urged the Canadian government to take the lead in such a campaign. Merely days after Rabbi Cooper's discussions with the government, Reem Salah Riashi, a 22-year-old Hamas operative, gruesomely underscored the urgency of his plea when she killed herself and four Israelis in the Gaza Strip.

What started as a ghoul's terrorism aimed primarily at Israelis and Jews has proliferated to all parts of the globe. Christians, Muslims and Hindus have all been targeted by the suicide bomber's fanatic hatred. It is long past time that the collective international community mobilized all of its arsenal – police, military and legal – to eradicate suicide bombing.

Who more than Annan, the symbolic leader of the international community, has the moral authority to launch that mobilization? What institution more than the United Nations has the jurisdictional responsibility to do so?

Martin can use the occasion of Annan's visit as more than a visual metaphor of Canada's deep commitment to internationalism and multilateralism in the conduct of its foreign affairs. He can use it as an actual beginning blow against the people who plot suicide bombing. A personal plea by the Prime Minister of Canada, a policy statement from the Foreign Ministry of Canada or an all-party resolution by Parliament urging the secretary general to use the full weight of his office to bring the matter to the UN would be a fitting response to Rabbi Cooper's cri de coeur.

Of course, Canada would also have to demonstrate its own resolve and good faith in the matter by making suicide bombing actionable under domestic criminal prosecutions as well.

"Canada is a leader," Rabbi Cooper told The CJN. "If Canada stands up and makes statements on crossing the line on incitement and hate, that could have an impact in Tokyo, Germany and France… We don't see this as a political football, but as standing for Canadian values."

We agree with Rabbi Cooper.

We therefore call upon Martin to lead the way in this battle. He should conscript the United Nations – or proceed alone if necessary – wielding as his sword the love of democracy and freedom and the reverence for the sanctity of all human life that are Canada's irreducible core values.

Israel would control refugee number

Howard Adelman is incorrect when he states that the number of Palestinian refugees allowed into Israel will be outside Israel's control, according to the Geneva Accord ("A peacenik's dissenting view on the Accord," CJN, Jan. 1).

The following is the relevant text from the Geneva Accord, as taken from the Ha'aretz website:

"[The number of Palestinian refugees allowed to go to Israel] shall be at the sovereign discretion of Israel and will be in accordance with a number that Israel will submit to the International Commission. This number shall represent the total number of Palestinian refugees that Israel shall accept. As a basis, Israel will consider the average of the total numbers submitted by the different third countries [accepting refugees] to the International Commission."

Since Israel would only consider the average mentioned above, it could still do what it likes. Any formula that was used would be decided by Israel alone. All Israel has to do is tell the International Commission how many refugees it is willing to accept.

Says Hillel could do better

I agree with Tilly Shames' argument that the media tend to sensationalize the issues and often look for the "sexy" stories ("Plenty of reasons to be proud of our students," CJN, Jan. 16). Her article about campus political activity in relation to Israel accurately captures many of the highs and lows of a complex situation. That said, I must disagree with Shames on a number of counts.

First, Shames' article loses credibility because she is an employee of Hillel. The backpatting of her own organization makes her biased. Shames avoids the reality that many youth-oriented pro-Israel programs in the past three years have been organized by groups and people working independently of Hillel. Their strong initiatives were not given a single mention in her article. It is tremendously important that we look at the whole picture in order to maintain our own credibility.

Second, Hillel has been inattentive to many students' pleas for help in certain cases. Indeed, there are plenty of reasons to be proud of how many of our students have come forward to help. But some were snubbed because of their political affiliation or because they dared to disagree with Hillel's event-planning scheme. Others found Hillel programming inadequate or ineffective.

A couple of decades ago, young Jews fought fiercely for oppressed Syrian, Russian and Ethiopian Jews. Yet today, for some reason, many Jewish students are questioning Israel's right to exist. Somehow, Hillel isn't leading the charge to get Israel into the hearts and minds of the majority of Jewish students. How can this be?

Hospital has Jewish heart and soul

Kudos to Leila Speisman for her article on Mount Sinai Hospital ("Is Mount Sinai still a Jewish Hospital?" CJN, Jan. 22). The Jewishness of Mount Sinai cannot be judged by the number of Jewish patients one finds there. Just as non-Jewish hospitals cater as much as possible to the religious wishes of their Jewish patients, so too Mount Sinai caters to its non-Jewish clientele.

So what makes it a Jewish hospital, outside of the fact that it is largely supported by the Jewish community? It's not only the Jewish religious practices observed there, but also how they are carried out.

My attention was drawn recently to a sign prominently posted beside the elevator that stated, "Minchah service every day at 1 p.m." Where else would we see this but at a Jewish hospital with a Jewish heart and soul?

Questions still linger about kosher beef (1)

As a kosher beef consumer, I found that the article "Kosher beef safe, industry says" (CJN, Jan. 15) missed significant concerns about mad-cow disease.

The following questions still need answers: Do the laws of kashrut forbid the use of feed containing animal by-products for cattle destined for the kosher meat counter? Does the shochet know if the cow being selected for kosher slaughter was born to a cow that was raised on animal by-product feed? Are calves destined for kosher slaughter fed milk replacer containing cattle blood protein and beef tallow? Can the shochet determine this in the selection process and does he reject cows/calves accordingly?

Unless these issues (and others) can be resolved, nobody should be stating that kosher beef is any safer from bovine spongiform encephalopathy, or BSE, than non-kosher beef.

Your article on kosher beef ("Kosher beef safe, industry says," CJN, Jan. 15) concentrates on the slaughtering of the animals and avoids the subject of what the cattle have been fed. Even if the meat is safe, I think it would be useful for The CJN to address the issue of whether this meat can be kosher.

I would like to know if the Vaad Ha'ir, or any other Jewish organization, monitors the kind of feed given to cattle that are later certified as being kosher.

Remembering the Columbia and Ilan Ramon

One year ago, on Feb. 1, the world was transfixed in horror and grief as the Columbia shuttle orbiter and its crew failed to return safely to earth.

We offer a photo montage of Columbia crew member Col. Ilan Ramon, the first Israeli astronaut.

Mission control at NASA woke the crew one morning to the words of John Lennon's song Imagine. Ramon spoke the following words, a translation of his colleague William McCool's greetings to the world that day.

"From the view of our spaceship orbiting the globe, we are looking upon you, and in front of us we see a world without borders, so peaceful and so splendid. The prayer in our hearts is that all humanity might imagine the world as we see it and aspire to live together in peace."

Jewish continuity through sport

The earliest recorded involvement of Jews in organized sport dates back to 1368. Participation at that time was sporadic, and remained so until the 19th century, when Jewish entrants were allowed into various sports leagues across Europe and were even drawn into the prestigious Gymnastics Movement in Germany. Selected for the German team, Jewish athletes went to the first Olympic Games in 1896 and also competed in the Paris Olympics four years later.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

But the welcome mat for Jewish athletes did not extend very far, and it was left to the Jewish leadership of the day to create their own infrastructure to advance sport in their local communities. As more and more all-Jewish sports clubs were established in both central and eastern Europe, an association of these facilities, known as the Judische Turnerschaft, began to take shape. In 1927, during the 12th Zionist Congress in Carlsbad, delegates of the Turnerschaft centralized their activities under the banner of the newly-formed Maccabi World Union (MWU).

Promoting "good citizenship and a sense of kinship with fellow Jews" were important objectives of the sports organizations that preceded the MWU. The earliest constitution of the MWU embraced similar sentiments, committing itself "to foster physical education and the belief in Jewish heritage and the Jewish nation." It also pledged "to work actively for the rebuilding of our own country and for the preservation of our people."

Nurturing Jewish identity and a love for Israel is still a powerful force in the Maccabi movement worldwide. Recently, in my role as chef de mission for the Canadian team that took part in the Pan American Maccabi Games in Santiago, Chile, I was again able to experience (as I did in the 1997 and 2001 Maccabiot in Israel) the remarkable effect that gatherings of this sort can have on young Jewish athletes. Aside from the obvious exhilaration of the sports activities themselves, there emerges at such events a unique sense of belonging, a commonality of tradition and values that transcends language, nationality and individual aspirations.

Continuity has been high on the agendas of Jewish communities worldwide over the past several years. And while it is generally accepted that a formal Jewish education is the fundamental building block for enhancing Jewish identity, it is also agreed that other creative strategies need to be explored if we are to succeed in drawing our younger generation closer to Judaism and Israel.

Involvement in sport, whether through Maccabi or other recognized Jewish affiliations, can be an effective vehicle in this regard. What was once shown to work so well in the sports clubs of Europe may now find renewed relevance in the cultural melting pots of the modern day Diaspora.

High on the Golan

Living in Jerusalem, I always appreciate getting away for a few days to bucolic parts of the country rarely in the news. The Golan Heights fits the bill perfectly.

I went there recently with my family for a brief holiday. Nothing in Israel beats the Golan for unspoiled nature and tranquillity. We'd been there often in the past, but this time we planned something different – a day on Mount Hermon in the thick of winter.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Situated on the northeastern border with Syria, "the Hermon," as Israelis affectionately call it, is the sole place in Israel where winter is white for more than a day. It even has a ski resort. At a height of 2,020 meters above sea level, the Hermon is Israel's only real mountain and a vital, strategic asset. With sophisticated monitoring devices installed on its peak, the Hermon has long helped the army watch over unfriendly neighbours.

My children, who are half-Canadian, have always been fascinated by the fact that their father grew up with snow. They were psyched big-time when I suggested our Golan trip include the Hermon. Then, two days before we left Jerusalem, the evening news reported the season's first major snowstorm had blanketed the mountain in white. There was no turning back now. If even the mere sight of flakes falling from the sky is a surefire crowd-pleaser in Israel, the promise of a day in deep snow – walking in it, jumping in it, sliding on it, throwing it, taking a chairlift over it – is cause for euphoria.

Our kids were also intrigued by the idea that they'd be at the highest, most northern point in the country – at the top of Israel. The other extreme is much closer to our home in Jerusalem. Just east of the capital, on the steep, winding road descending toward Jericho, a marker indicates that you've reached sea level. Continue 15 minutes further and you hit the Dead Sea and the lowest place on earth and the bottom of the country.

From there to the top of Israel is about a four-hour drive north. It's worth the trip, especially the final hour that takes you through the Golan up to the Hermon ski resort. The day we were there it was a mob scene.

Many of the visitors had never seen so much snow before and it showed. Despite the bone-chilling cold, people were ill-prepared for the situation. They lacked gloves, boots or even winter coats. Amazingly, they didn't seem to mind. They were simply in awe of the white splendour around them. Such is the Hermon's exotic lure during the winter that on an average weekday, it attracts some 3,000 Israelis, and even more on weekends.

By international standards, the Hermon's skiing facilities are modest. Few Israelis go skiing or snowboarding there and clearly many who do need to take a lesson or two before hurtling down the slopes. We watched in wonder that they didn't crash into other skiers and actually made it to the bottom in one piece.

Our kids had a magnificent time. It was the high point (pardon the pun) of our Golan trip. They played in the snow, rented sleds to slide down hills, rode the Alpine Coaster and took a chair lift to the top of the Hermon for the spectacular view of northern Israel, Syria and Lebanon. Their only disappointment was that the sun set so early, at 4:30 in the afternoon, ending their fun.

"I think this will be one of our best years since the site opened in 1971," Menachem Baruch told me. A resident of nearby Kibbutz Neve Ativ, he's managed the resort since 1997.

What did Baruch think of all the recent talk, yet again, of possible peace negotiations with Syria leading to Israel losing the Golan?

"I really don't think most Israelis would ever agree to give up something so strategic as the Golan Heights, especially to a dictatorship," Baruch said. "Our best ally is the Assad family [that has ruled Syria for decades]. As long as an Assad is in power in Damascus, we're in good shape. They don't genuinely want to make peace with Israel."

Based on the latest polls, most Israelis have little confidence in Syrian President Bashar Assad, and even less in a peace agreement that would require yielding the Golan Heights. And it's not because of the snow.

A new Libya, or a change in tactics and tone?

There is a new Libya, or so we are told. Not that there has been a change of leadership. The eccentric (and violent) Col. Moammar Gadhafi is still in charge, but the public face of the new Libya is Saif al-Islam ("Sword of Islam") Gadhafi, whose elegantly tailored suits, gold chains, wire-rimmed spectacles and shaven head radiate wealth and western culture.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

To hear Saif (who speaks passable English) tell it, Libya's days of absurd mega-projects, North Korean missiles, chemical weapons, secret nuclear plants and terrorism are over.

According to media reports, Saif is central in extricating his father from the sanctions imposed on Libya after the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988. He is also reportedly behind Libya's decision to relinquish illicit weapons of mass destruction and to invite inspectors to demonstrate compliance – a wise move, considering Libya was nearing the top of Washington's post-Saddam list of targets for regime change, particularly after the capture of uranium enrichment components.

Young Gadhafi has also appeared at some not-so-secret gatherings in Europe that included Israeli academics and politicians. His participation, he says, is strictly in a "private capacity" – he has no ambitions or official role in his father's regime. Unlike Bashar (son of the late Hafez) Assad of Syria, Gamal (son of Hosni) Mubarak of Egypt, or Abdullah (son of the late Hussein) of Jordan, citizen Saif is totally immersed in "private" pursuits, particularly running the Gadhafi International Foundation for Charity Associations.

Yet, Saif and his foundation have not stayed away from issues of the day. In addition to helping his father, the younger Gadhafi went out of his way a few years ago to support Joerg Haider's extremist Freedom Party in Austria's elections, setting up a warm reception in Libya and an audience with (and perhaps a small contribution from) the colonel.

Perhaps we should excuse that episode as a youthful error in judgement and focus on the positive. For example, after decades of competing with Saddam's Iraq, Iran and Syria for leadership in anti-Israel terrorism and rejectionism, the new face of Libya is peace and harmony. In meetings with Israelis (coincidentally, in the presence of approving American officials), Saif complains bitterly about "the misinformation campaign of which my country has been a victim over the years."

To clarify the issue, the Gadhafi family has published its "White Book," a plan to bring peace and economic co-operation to the Middle East that Saif touts in his speeches. It recognizes that in an age of globalization and trade blocks, small states are at an inherent disadvantage. Israel and Palestine are both too small to compete, says Saif – speaking only as a private citizen, of course – and would be better off in a single state known as "Isratine".

And there's the rub. While the language is sugar-coated, the message has not changed – the Gadhafis, speaking for all Arabs and Muslims, are still not ready for Jewish sovereignty.

As Saif's boilerplate presentation continues, the mask slips, and he declares that the conflict between the Arabs and the West is all the result of the creation of Israel.

Palestinians in the audience groan at this point – the dirty little secret is out: the problem is not "the occupation" or "settlements," but Israel itself. Adding a patronizing comment that "the Jews cannot sustain a state in the face of such opposition," the message is that, like the Muslims in Spain 600 years ago, the Jews will eventually have to give up.

Saif then offers the generous hospitality and protection of the Arabs – in other words, back to "dhimmihood" and second-class status, as long as we Jews know our place.

Gadhafi's Libya may have changed tactics and tone, but its goals remain the same.

Saif al-Islam would do well as a private citizen running an advertising agency or entertainment firm. But as the would-be successor to a totalitarian regime that keeps its citizens in poverty and fear, and seeks the destruction of Israel and the end of the Jewish civilization, Saif is doomed to failure.

The Kirshner File

Syria's call for talks causes divisions in Israel

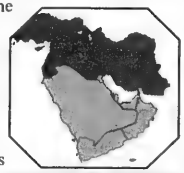
Since the end of the war in Iraq, the president of Syria, Bashar Assad, has conveyed three unmistakable, though indirect, signals to Israel calling for a resumption of bilateral peace talks.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israel's last set of negotiations with Syria, which were sponsored by the Clinton administration, took place in the United States four years ago, and revolved around the final status of the Golan Heights – captured by Israel in the Six Day War – security guarantees, water rights and a normalization of relations within the context of a formal peace treaty.

Assad launched his first overture in April 2003, telling U.S. Congressman Tom Lantos – a survivor of the Holocaust – that he was ready to restart negotiations at the point where they ended in January 2000. He repeated his offer on Nov. 30 in an interview with The New York Times, saying that 80 per cent of Syria's differences with Israel had already been resolved. Last week, Assad restated his desire to renew talks, informing a London-based Arab newspaper, Ashraq al-Awsat, that his objective is "to reach a clear peace" with Israel.

But Assad's latest trial balloons were offset by dark rumblings from his prime minister, Naji al-Otari, who said, "There is no hope under this Zionist administration for achieving a just and comprehensive peace."



Mideast Analysis

Israel, which has historically sought a rapprochement with Syria, has responded coolly and warily to Assad's offers. Reacting to Syria's first demarche, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said that he was open to talks without preconditions. But in fact, Sharon added two deal-breaking caveats: Israel will not withdraw to the June 4, 1967, armistice lines, and talks should start from scratch.

Responding to Assad's second proposal, Sharon said that he would be willing to engage Syria, but not as long as Damascus wages a proxy war against Israel through Hezbollah in the Har Dov region, and as long as Hamas and Islamic Jihad, both backed by Syria, continue to stage suicide bombings.

Sharon's judgment is that Israel "should not rush to embrace the Syrians before thoroughly investigating what lies behind the Syrian initiative." Pointedly questioning Assad's sincerity, Sharon suggested that Syria's motives are suspect. He argues that Syria may be more interested in fending off U.S. pressure and breaking out of its current political isolation than in actually engaging Israel in a genuine dialogue.

To a degree, Sharon is right.

Since the American and British invasion of Iraq last March, Washington's ties with Syria – a country the U.S. State Department has branded as a supporter of terrorism – have unravelled.

No sooner had major hostilities ended than U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell and President George W. Bush both accused the Syrian government of allowing men and materiel to flow into Iraq via Syria. The Syrians denied the accusation, but to no avail. Several months ago, the U.S. Congress passed a bill – the Syria Accountability and Lebanese Restoration Act – that may yet saddle the Syrian regime with economic sanctions. The bill calls on Damascus to stop supporting terrorist groups, to withdraw its forces from Lebanon and to prove it is no longer developing medium- and long-range missiles and chemical and biological weapons.

Interestingly, the legislation passed the committee stage only three days after Israeli aircraft bombed a Palestinian militant training camp in Syria and buzzed Assad's palace in Damascus, the first Israeli attack in Syria since the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Bush, at his discretion, can ban most U.S. exports to Syria and prevent Americans from investing there. In addition, he can freeze Syrian assets in the United States, impose restrictions on Syrian diplomats in the United States and bar Syrian planes from using American airspace.

The spectre of U.S. sanctions notwithstanding, Syria also faces the prospect of regional isolation in the aftermath of the Iraqi war. The last Baathist state in the Arab world, Syria lost much of its military clout and political influence following the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. With Saddam Hussein's Iraq having passed into history, Syria finds itself in the unenviable position of being surrounded by an interlocking constellation of staunchly pro-American states ranging from Israel and Jordan to Turkey and Iraq.

Syria, therefore, is desperate to curry favour with the United States, and one way of doing so would be to engage Israel yet again in a peace process.

Previously, Syria conducted negotiations with Israel from 1991 to 1996 and again from 1999 to 2000. By all accounts, the negotiations foundered over Syria's insistence to regain the northeast corner of the Sea of Galilee – captured by Syria during the first Arab-Israeli war in 1948 and wrested away by Israel in the Six Day War.

Bashar Assad

While it is true that Syria can improve its relationship with the United States by discussing peace with Israel, Damascus' interest in talks is largely animated by its burning desire to recover the Golan Heights, a point that Sharon – an opponent of a full withdrawal from the Golan – deliberately minimizes. Last week, Sharon stated the obvious: the final outcome of talks with Damascus would be the return of the Golan to Syria, a development that many members of his generally right-wing cabinet would vehemently oppose.

This is not mere conjecture. Public Security Minister Tzachi Hanegbi recently disclosed that Sharon has no intention of parting with the Golan. And in a similar vein, the seasoned Israeli analyst Ze'ev Schiff wrote, "The Israeli leadership recoils from the price involved in negotiations with Syria." Washington's former ambassador to Syria, Theodore Kattouf, agrees with this assessment, having written that Sharon would be willing to make only minor territorial concessions.

The problem is exacerbated by Israeli policy. On Dec. 31, Israel announced plans to spend $90 million (US) to expand existing settlements on the Golan – home to some 18,000 Jewish settlers – and Israel's agriculture minister, Yisrael Katz, asserted, "There is no dialogue with the Syrians. The Golan is an integral part of Israel, and we don't have any intention of giving up our hold."

Pressure, however, is building on Sharon to resume talks with Syria, even after Syria's brusque rejection of Israeli President Moshe Katsav's invitation to Assad to visit Israel.

According to reports, the top echelon of the Israeli army, from Chief of Staff Gen. Moshe Yaalon on down, believes that Israel should put Assad to the test, even if Syria's offer is merely tactical.

Their thinking, in part, stems from the assumption that the Palestinian Authority is not ready for a peace agreement, and that talks with Syria might mitigate the international criticism of Israel's decision to build a security fence through the West Bank and Jerusalem and its intention to separate unilaterally from the Palestinians.

More to the point, the head of military intelligence, Gen. Aharon Farkash Ze'evi, is of the opinion that Assad is "serious" about peace and that Israel should exploit Syria's currently weak and isolated condition. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, the former chief of staff and a minister in the last Labour government, has observed that the fall of Saddam Hussein, combined with American pressure on Syria, makes this a propitious time for negotiations.

Ministers in Sharon's cabinet, including Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom and Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, have urged Sharon to respond positively, as have the presidents of Turkey and Egypt and the United Nations' Middle East envoy, Terje Roed-Larsen. Shalom has said that while it is premature to speak of an Israeli pullout from the Golan, Israel must seriously explore Syria's offer. Netanyahu, whose government held secret negotiations with Syria in the late 1990s and reportedly agreed to a withdrawal from much of the Golan, basically concurs with Shalom, as does Justice Minister Yosef Lapid. If only for public relations reasons, Lapid has urged Sharon to announce unequivocal support for talks.

Meanwhile, Shimon Peres, the opposition leader, has called on Sharon to formally invite Assad to Jerusalem for formal talks. It would be extremely surprising if Assad accepted such an invitation. His late father, Hafez, rejected similar overtures from Yitzhak Rabin, as well as from his successor, Peres.

During the 1990s, the Syrians were not prepared to implement confidence-building measures before an Israeli withdrawal, and this is doubtless true today.

Nevertheless, Israel has nothing to lose – and probably something to gain – by testing Syria's intentions.

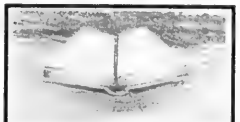
Jewish Life

A rabbi for the entire congregation

By RABBI CHANANYA M. BERZON

Virtually at the outset of the Exodus, the Almighty cajoles Moses into assuming the mantle of leadership of the Jewish people. God says to Moses: "Ra'oh ra'iti" – "I have surely seen the dire poverty and suffering of My nation." The Midrash Rabbah notes that it does not say "I have seen" once, but twice: "Ra'oh ra'iti." Both words from the same Hebrew root. So why is it repeated?



Rabbinic Reflections

Occasionally we see a word or phrase in biblical text that is repeated to stress its importance. At other times, the repetition imparts a unique second thought. Why is the phrase repeated in this verse?

The Midrash explains that God said: "Moses, you can only see one vision. But I see two visions. You see the Jews approaching Sinai and receiving My Law and so do I. But I can also see the vision of the Golden Calf." As it is stated: "I have seen (ra'iti) this people."

Essentially the Midrash is telling us Hashem mentions to Moses that He has observed two episodes of the Jews: their acceptance of the Torah at Sinai, and their worshipping the Golden Calf.

It is logical for HaShem to reveal to Moses that the Jews will be receiving the Torah at Mount Sinai, for He is inducing him to undertake the mantle of rabbinical leadership. HaShem is telling Moses that he will have the kavod, the honour, of giving the Torah to the Jewish people.

But why does God mention the tragic and humiliating episode of the Golden Calf at this crucial moment when the Jews await redemption? HaShem feels the necessity of finding a worthy leader and attempts to coax Moses into undertaking the challenging charge to become Moshe Rabbeinu – the rabbi, the leader and master teacher. Is it prudent to portray the faults and frailties of the Israelites? Does a salesman stress the defects and the deficiencies of the product he is promoting?

From the outset, HaShem impresses upon Moses the need to perceive that the Jews are not monolithic. There are those who will stand at Mount Sinai to embrace the Torah. But there are also others who will create a golden image and worship it. Moses must grasp that reality. He is undertaking the leadership of the entire nation, not just the elite. All are part of the chosen people, Am Yisrael. He has to worry about, care for, visit, teach, counsel, befriend and comfort an entire congregation from all walks of life. They are all under his charge.

"Moses!" God says. "I hope you undertake the position. But you must know that you can not be the rabbi of just a select group. You must lead the entire congregation – the entire spectrum!"

Moses takes this lesson to heart. When HaShem later threatens to destroy the nation for worshipping the Golden Calf, Moses has a direct and curt response: "God, if this is what You want, then remove me from Your Book. These are my people. I love them All and care for All of them. After all, is this not what You taught me! I will not be party to their destruction."

Every rabbi must emulate Moshe Rabbeinu by attending to all of his congregants. By doing so, he brings brachah and hatzlachah to the entire community, guiding them all on the right path.

In the presence of the Big Lie

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

What do the names Hannafin, Iskyan, Mojica, Vamsikrishna, Yuguang, Shuyin and Pappalardo all have in common? They were all victims of Sept. 11. Far from anti-western terrorism having a coherent and noble rationale that is so often excused by media liberals or naive but out-of-their-depth idealists – that terror is bred by poverty or imperialist hegemony or American trash porn culture or the white man's endless colonial sins or, of course, the Zionist entity and its worldwide conspirators – these names show how thoughtless opinions are now endlessly recycled as wisdom.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The families of these men and women had, at some point, come to North America to live in freedom and economic possibility. Far from America being the "Great White Satan" oppressing other cultures, it is the refuge of those who seek liberation. Only in democracies can there be handwringing over a possible backlash against Muslims in the wake of 9/11. Only in places that have free speech can Israelis write newspaper columns savaging their own government. As columnist Mark Steyn once noted wryly, "If Washington treated Arabs the way Damascus does, you'd never hear the end of it at UN conferences."

The mendacity of what I read and hear these days is breathtaking. Everything that was uttered at the 2001 United Nations' World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, was a lie. Israeli "occupation" is a lie. The fence as an "obstacle to peace" is a lie. The West as the current cause of Africa's crippled status is a lie. When Nelson Mandela calls U.S. President George W. Bush a greater threat to peace than Saddam Hussein; when President Robert Mugabe thugs his way through Zimbabwe and leads it to absolute ruin, but an EU poll cites Israel as the greatest threat to world peace; when North Korea, Iran, Syria, and Sudan smother their people with fear and intimidation, but French diplomats pontificate about that "shitty little country;" you're in the presence of the Big Lie. In Orwellian fashion, lies have become accepted truth.

Worst of all, some of my students and academic colleagues echo these platitudes. Now, from veteran self-loathers such as Noam Chomsky this might be tragically predictable, but from otherwise intelligent and sensitive Jews (that is, who are not enraged or carrying an agenda), the trend is more troubling.

Their self-flagellation stems from a curse that often befalls Jews when they talk about Israel – a feeling that Jews are not entitled. Like a beautiful and intelligent woman who consistently dates men who are bad for her because she unconsciously feels she does not merit better, the problem of entitlement lies at the core of these discussions. The fainthearted (and historically clueless) among us ask, "Is Israel really ours? Did we steal it from the other guys?" And not Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's billion dollar bank accounts, not suicide bombers, not even Hamas' stated goal of destruction of the Jewish state and its replacement with a Muslim theocracy – none of these nasty facts gets in the way of the feeling that we are undeserving.

Famed author A.B. Yehoshua once called exile the neurotic solution of the Jews to their deep unconscious fear of living in Israel. His poignantly funny solution was for the Jewish people to undergo collective psychotherapy. In the same way, we need to work through our crippling guilt over entitlement. Or perhaps we just need to embrace Peter Finch's immortal words in the movie Network: we're mad as hell and we're not going to take it anymore.

Lawyer grapples with death penalty

Ultimate Punishment: A Lawyer's Reflections on Dealing with the Death Penalty*, by Scott Turow, Farrar, Staus and Giroux, $29.95.

The many-sided problem of capital punishment is always with us. In the United States, it is an issue of particular concern and debate. America is still one of the few countries in the world where people are regularly executed (Singapore and Japan are among the others, while the practice has essentially been abolished in Europe).

Books
Bernard Baskin

In recent years, the death penalty has come under fire because a significant number of people who were sentenced to death have been found demonstrably innocent. (DNA testing, in particular, has led to the overturning of a considerable number of wrongful convictions.)

Among the states that sentenced many innocent men to die in recent years was Illinois. In 1999, then-governor George Ryan declared a moratorium on further executions and named a 14-member commission to recommend how the system might be fixed. Turow, a lawyer and author, was appointed to the commission and Ultimate Punishment is his personal account of grappling with the issues over the two years the group worked.

At the time Turow served on the commission, he considered himself "a death penalty agnostic." Ultimate Punishment is the account of his transformation from someone "afraid to come down on either side of the question" to an advocate of abolishing the death sentence.

The author says if you kill a white person, you are more likely to be tried under a state's death penalty provision. True, too, if you kill a woman. Rural areas, at least in Illinois, try more people under capital provisions than do cities. And one point no one wants to acknowledge: bad lawyering can buy you a death sentence.

The most important passage in the rabbinic literature regarding capital punishment is found in the Mishnah: a Sanhedrin that executes [a criminal] once in seven years is known as destructive.

Rabbi Eleazar, the son of Azariah, argues: a Sanhedrin that executes a criminal once in 70 years is destructive. Rabbi Tarfon and Rabbi Akiva say if they had been members of the Sanhedrin, no man would ever have been executed. Rabban Simeon, the son of Gamaliel, argues that capital punishment is the most powerful of deterrents and its abolition will only lead to an increase in crimes of violence and murder. He says Rabbi Tarfon and Rabbi Akiva would have been responsible for the proliferation of murderers of Israel.

All the teachers mentioned in the Mishnah lived at a time when the Sanhedrin had been defunct for about 150 years. For all that, the opening statement that it was rare for a criminal to be executed by the Sanhedrin may well be accurate.

Rabban Simeon's argument is the stock argument of the anti-abolitionists even today. It is interesting to find these rabbis advocating the abolition of capital punishment even though the Bible sanctions the punishment in a number of instances. They evidently believed that the biblical law was intended as a solemn warning about the extreme seriousness of the crime, but that the courts were justified in circumventing the law.

In the State of Israel, capital punishment has been abolished, except for the offences of treason and genocide.

Turow concludes: "Standing back from it all, I found it hard to discern the guiding hand of reason. Adding these factors together – race, gender, geography, who the lawyers and jurors are, and the sheer serendipity of circumstances – one sees anything but the kind of bright-line proportionate morality the death penalty is intended to symbolize."

Bagels, part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Just think of a bagel as a warm, chewy halo
The angels gave us to eat.
It will fill you with passion,
It will fill you with joy,
Not to mention two pounds of wheat.
— Richard Marcus [www.spamula.net/cgi-bin/mt-comments.cgi?entry_id=26]

OK, a bagel might not have two pounds of wheat, but you have to know what to put into your bagel if you want to create a mouth-watering delight. Today, some of the best bagel recipes from the World Wide Web – and then a word about bagel philosophy.

If you are looking for a bagel recipe, the first place to check out is the Jewish-food bagel archives, which contain more than two dozen varieties, including egg, onion, whole wheat, cheese and cranberry orange [www.jewish-food.org/ recipes/bagindex.htm]. From the too-good-to-be-true department, Julie's Fantastic Fat-Free Bagels have yeast, flour and brown sugar, but no oil [http://vegweb.com/food/bread/601.shtml].

If you cannot dream of going a week without a bagel, now is the time to start perfecting your own Passover bagels. Is this really what the Israelites noshed on while sojourning in the Sinai? [www.holidays.net/passover/recipes/pasbagel.htm] For something different, Crazay Bagels call for cinnamon, raspberries and chocolate [http://homecooking.about.com/gi/dynamic/offsite.htm?site=http://breadrecipe.com/az/crazaybagels.asp]. And I'm not sure what route their inventors took from the Old Country, but Hawaiian Bagels wouldn't be authentic without dried coconut and pineapple [http://homecooking.about.com/library/archive/blbread87.htm].

Never try to convince Johanne Blank that a bagel should have trendy ingredients. She says that in the United States, "most people's idea of a bagel seems to be of a vaguely squishy unsweetened doughnut, possibly with some sort of godawful flavouring mixed into it [with the 'blueberry bagel' being perhaps the most offensive], generally purchased in lots of six in some supermarket… possibly even frozen. These are not those bagels." Blank then tells us how to create the "real, honest, Jewish [Lower East Side] purists' bagel." With an introduction like that, they better be good [http://makeashorterlink.com/?Z24812B07].

Speaking of purists, it takes an ex-Montrealer a few nanoseconds to bemoan the absence of the best (BEST!) bagels anywhere. Travel writer Norman Goldman has trekked from the St. Viateur to the Fairmount Avenue shrines and describes what it's like to wait as the bagels are browning in the wood ovens [http://makeashorterlink.com/?X14923B17]. Dare I mention that New Yorker Matthew Goodman, food maven for the Forward, actually agrees that the best bagels are in Montreal? [http://makeashorterlink.com/?K5A923B17] If you want to try to fool a Montrealer, here's Marcy Goldman's authentic recipe [www.recipezaar.com/35261].

Now that you know how to bake a bagel, it's time to decide what to spread on it. Sure, you could opt for the tried-and-true lox and cream cheese. But I came across a recipe page with some creative spreads like Baked Brie with Amaretto, Peppery Avocado Puree and that old stand-by, Pumpkin Fluff Dip. (Please note that some other bagel toppings on this page are not kosher.) [http://homecooking.about.com/library/archive/blbread26.htm]

Although a fresh bagel is a delight, after a few days, a bagel can transform into a substance that is hazardous to your teeth. Thankfully, the Epicurious website has some clever suggestions for using bagels as an ingredient. You'll find out how to create Onion Bagel Croutons and Garlic Rosemary Bagel Chips [http://makeashorterlink.com/?J28A52B07].

More than just a foodstuff, bagels have taken a place in the world of philosophy. Ponder this piece of wisdom: "Life is like a bagel. It's delicious when fresh and warm, but often it's just hard" [www.kemc.edu/taste.html].

And then there's tale of a wonder-rabbi, who on his deathbed whispers to his chief assistant, "Life is like a bagel." The word spreads through the crowd waiting outside the rabbi's house, "The rabbi says life is like a bagel," until finally, at the edge of the crowd, it reaches the town fool, who asks, "What does it mean: life is like a bagel?" The question spreads back through the crowd, "What does it mean, life is like a bagel?" until it reaches the bedside of the rabbi. "Rabbi," his assistant asks, "What does it mean, life is like a bagel?" "Nu," the rabbi says, weakly shrugging his shoulders, "so life is not like a bagel" [www.nybooks.com/articles/article-preview?article_id=6351].

Portion of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Students learn about the Dead Sea Scrolls

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish and non-Jewish students in Ontario and Quebec are learning that there is more to Israel than conflict.

English and French-speaking students in both provinces are being given presentations on the Dead Sea Scrolls, currently on display until April 12 at the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Ottawa.

The exhibition includes 100 rare artifacts from the biblical period in Israel, including three of the original Dead Sea Scrolls discovered in a cave in 1947. The scrolls reveal currents of religious thought and society in Israel in the centuries just before and after the birth of Jesus.

Omer Eshel, educational director of Habonim Dror and Camp Gesher, as well the Israeli shaliach for Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO), also trained staff at the Dead Sea Scrolls site in Qumran on the West Bank.

As part of his work here, he has been giving lectures on the scrolls to various groups.

"I was asked to give a presentation at the museum in Ottawa, and the museum translated the presentation into French and distributed it to schools across Quebec," Eshel said.

"By promoting this exhibit, we are promoting Israel and showing the beautiful side of the country. That is a form of Zionism."

It is important for non-Jewish audiences especially, he said, to see a Zionist youth movement teaching them something about Israel that is not related to the ongoing conflict with the Palestinians.

"They need some understanding of Israel's background. If people become knowledgeable, they will have a better perspective about things. If we can change one person's view, that is the first step."

It is also important, he said, for students to understand that life then was similar in many ways to life today.

"Habonim Dror is a socialist organization, and when we read the scroll that contains the Community Rule, we see that [the members of the Dead Sea sect it talks about] were also socialist. They were living on the first kibbutz in history.

"They ate together in a dining hall, every member had to bring his possessions and his earnings to a common fund, and they decided together how to distribute the money. More than 2,200 years later, we use the same model on a kibbutz."

Canadian youth join the Israeli army

He credits the education he received at Or Chaim for "providing us with a strong background and a lot of motivation. And we had a lot of strong people who had the courage to make the decision.

"I'm definitely motivated by Zionist ideals, a love of Israel and a desire to contribute to the Jewish people and also a sense of solidarity and responsibility with Israel, because Israelis our age have to do this. I wanted to be part of it," he said.

The son of Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation, Yakov is somewhat apprehensive about his Gaza posting. But despite the risks, he would never consider declining to serve, as have some IDF reservists. They're just "a vocal minority," Frydman-Kohl said, adding that people in the IDF put aside their personal opinions when they serve and fight together.

"When you're here on the inside, you see the army is careful to take the moral high road and is very careful [in] how it fights. The fight in Gaza is against terrorists and that's who we have to fight."

Although he was trained in tank-versus-tank, open-country warfare, Frydman-Kohl said he is ready for Gaza. The IDF has implemented very strict rules of engagement. Before firing, the tank commander must determine the enemy has a weapon and intends to use it. Then he must obtain permission from a superior officer before opening fire. Even in training, Frydman-Kohl said, crews are not permitted to shoot without orders.

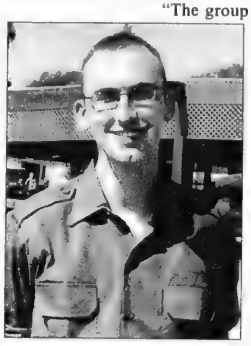
Though Canadians enlisting in the Israeli army is, if not rare, somewhat unusual, Israelis who have lived in Canada and are returning to serve is as old as Israel itself.

Though her family left Israel about four years ago and made a new life in Canada, Aviv always knew she'd return for military duty.

It wasn't a decision her parents or friends were particularly happy with. In fact, her parents tried to talk her out of it, thinking that without their nearby support, their daughter would find a two-year army stint too difficult to endure.



Yakov Frydman-Kohl

Yet Aviv, who did not want her last name used, was stubborn. She was going to serve even if her parents weren't fully supportive. Her brother was already in the army and when it became clear she was going, her parents sent her with their blessing.

They felt better when she decided not to go alone.

In the year before her service, while she studied psychology at Carleton University, Aviv hooked up with other Israelis who were living in North America and considering returning for army duty. In all, 34 young recruits – 18 girls and 16 boys – returned to Israel for army service this year, brought together by a unique program called Garin Tzabar.

Five times during the last year, Aviv and other Israelis flew into New Jersey for a weekend of special seminars, orientation sessions and get-togethers for prospective soldiers, and were briefed on their rights and obligations, as well as on the social and emotional issues that would lie ahead.

Garin Tzabar is sponsored by the Tzofim (Israel Scouts) movement and supported by Israel's Ministry of Absorption, the university student division of the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency's aliyah department.

Aviv, who attended William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate in north Toronto, said the sessions gave her the confidence to make her decision.

"The group did make the difference in [me] deciding to return to Israel," she said in an interview from a base on the Golan Heights.

While the army makes efforts to connect recruits to local families, Aviv said she wouldn't have felt comfortable in that sort of situation.

"I feel more comfortable and not as lonely going back" because of her friends, she said. "We became very close. We're like a big family."

The first part of their service consisted of three months living and working on a kibbutz – in her case, Deganiah Aleph, south of the Sea of Galilee.

The kibbutz serves as their home base, their home away from home on weekends and for other army furloughs.

For Yoni Epstein, who graduated from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) two years ago, his Israeli home base was Kibbutz Yiftach in the Upper Galilee near Kiryat Shmonah.

He too participated in the Garin Tzabar program and was part of a cohort of 20 Israelis (12 boys, eight girls) returning for army duty two years ago.

Epstein's parents are Canadians who had lived in Israel for many years and who returned to Toronto a few years ago. Epstein, who was born in Israel, said all the people in his group were Israelis living in the United States. When they returned for army duty more than one year ago, they stayed in the kibbutz for three months and performed the same kind of daily chores given foreign volunteers – working in the chicken coop and barns and even in the factory that produces irrigation wares for export around the world.

A few months after returning, they began basic training. Although they travelled to Israel as a group, they performed their army service individually, Epstein said.

Epstein now serves in the IDF's education corps, which holds weekend sessions for Grade 11 students to get them ready for upcoming army duty. He instructs them in physical training.

Like Aviv, Epstein probably could have found a way not to do his army service. But his sense of loyalty to Canada was too low – he'd only lived here for three years – and his connection to Israel was too great.

"There's a lot of patriotism here and my friends are in the army. Particularly in these times, I wanted to give to the country."

Nevertheless, Epstein, whose father, Seymour, is executive-director of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education, thinks he'll head back to Canada at the end of his three-year tour of duty. He plans to pursue a university education in either business or law.

Aviv may also come back to Canada.

"If I go back, it will probably only be for school, but I think I'll end up here."

That's a pattern being forged by other Garin Tzabar participants. Epstein knows of five families that moved back permanently to Israel after they returned to be close to their children while they were in the military.

Canada urged to shift Mideast policy

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

There are many tools Canada could use to shore up relations with Israel, but in the meantime, this country's policy on the Middle East must be more clearly articulated and communicated, according to a panel of experts.

Mainly, the panel on Canadian foreign policy in the Middle East, moderated by St. Paul's Liberal MP and Minster of State for Public Health Carolyn Bennett at Holy Blossom Temple last week, agreed that Canada should abandon its traditional middle-of-the-road policy on the Mideast conflict and adopt a more honest, pragmatic approach that recognizes both Arab intransigence and Israel's commitment to western values.

Canada could step into a vacuum left by a toothless United Nations, urged Liberal Senator Jerry Grafstein, an outspoken supporter of Israel in government circles.

Despite the UN's best efforts at spreading democracy since the end of World War II, there is only one democracy in the Middle East – Israel – noted Grafstein, who appeared on the panel with York University political scientist David Dewitt and National Post editorialist Jonathan Kay.

One of the "best things" Canada can do to spread democratic values in the Middle East is to enter into a free trade deal with the whole region, Grafstein said. Canada already has free trade with Israel and there have been discussions of free trade with the Palestinian Authority.

"They want to talk economics. They want to help their people," Grafstein said of other Mideast nations.

To boost relations with Israel, Canada could sponsor the Jewish state's inclusion in both the Commonwealth and the Francophonie, he added.

Kay, whose newspaper is stridently pro-Israel, drew chuckles when he said Canada has "an almost fetishistic obsession with multilateralism" that best expressed itself at the 2001 UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, and at the United Nations Human Rights Commission, chaired, as Kay pointed out, by Libya.

"There's no moralism [in Canada's stance]. It's just a means to an often immoral end."

Canada "seems to construct a universe where all countries are equal. It's a desperate eagerness to be liked, part of our inferior complex. We're like the kid in the schoolyard who will make friends with anybody."

Canada's "desperate desire for validity is why we befriended [Zimbabwe's strongman president Robert] Mugabe. It's why [Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan] Nasrallah returns our phone calls."

Ottawa's traditional even-handedness in foreign affairs – "the idea that we should never blame anyone – is a recipe for amorality, not for building bridges," Kay said to applause.

On the other hand, it could be true that the current Liberal government is more pro-Israel than ordinary Canadians, he added.

Kay warned that if Canadian foreign policy continues the way it has, this country "will lack the moral vision of [U.S. President] George W. Bush."

Dewitt, of York's Centre for International and Security Studies, said Canadians face three challenges when it comes to Mideast policy:

- How do we understand the region and what difference does it make in Canadians' lives?
- What do we expect the government to do?; and
- What commitments should Canada make – direct financial aid, trade or expertise?

A blanket policy is ineffective, Dewitt argued. "We have to pick and choose."

In the meantime, Canadian parliamentarians "need to convince their Arab colleagues that the [Mideast] conflict is no longer an excuse for their corruption. And you can do that without a gun."

Bennett, who chairs the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group and is a member of the Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel Caucus, conceded she and others in government have not done a good enough job of conveying Israel's plight to fellow MPs and senators.

"We have to do a better job of explaining what security feels like in Israel. If we can't do it among parliamentarians, what hope is there in the Middle East?"

Last June, Bennett was one of 15 MPs and senators to submit a report to the Department of Foreign Affairs imploring Canada to "improve and refresh" its Mideast policy, in effect shifting to a more pro-Israel stance.

Among the key recommendations of the 25-page report were that Canada should sign a comprehensive "friendship agreement" with Israel that would strengthen Canadian-Israeli links "in virtually all aspects of society and government."

'No-name' shul celebrates 30th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Congregation Beth Haminyan has no rabbi, no cantor, and no actual synagogue building. Even its name is what some members call a "no-name."

But the Minyan, as it's sometimes referred to, appears to be thriving. On Feb. 15, the congregation will mark its 30th anniversary with an evening celebration at Bialik Hebrew Day School, where it holds High Holy Day services.

The small, unaffiliated congregation, which holds traditional Shabbat morning services at West Preparatory School in Upper Forest Hill, will honour founding members and raise funds to support the Temmy and Albert Latner Centre for the Treatment of Psychotrauma at Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem. A pet project for the past four years, the centre helps victims of terrorism.

Beth Haminyan is "more traditional than I am, but I was drawn to it," said Lisa Morrison, who joined when she was single, about 15 years ago. The mother of three and campaign director for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto said, "I liked the community involvement. I liked the members taking responsibility and participating. It's very laidback, very down-to-earth. There's also a lot of singing." In many ways, the Ohio native said, it reminds her of the Hillel services she attended as a student at the University of Florida in Gainesville.

Morrison has made her own mark on the congregation. Last year on Shavuot, they honoured her as Woman of the Year. Among other things, she was the driving force behind the Minyan's five-times-yearly egalitarian service, which is held in a separate room.

"It was important to me that it did not impinge upon the main service," Morrison said.

The first services were held in a kindergarten room at Beth Tzedec Congregation, said Robin Silverberg, Beth Haminyan's president. A founding member who joined at age 17, she is now looking forward to her daughter's bat mitzvah, which coincides with the Minyan's 30th anniversary.

Silverberg's friend's father, Ben Grossman, started the small, chavurah-style minyan following a year's sabbatical in Israel, where he now lives, she said.

Although bat mitzvahs were not celebrated in the synagogue's early days, the traditional services "have not varied substantially from year to year," said Silverberg.

These days, girls celebrating their bat mitzvahs can read the maftir and Haftorah, but only on that one occasion. Women may also give divrei Torah and often read megillot, said Silverberg. Aside from the services of a part-time executive director and a hired ba'al koreh, "everything is participatory and member-led."

In addition to weekly services, Beth Haminyan offers a children's program, a "Lunch and Learn" program four to five times a year, and weekly Chumash classes as well as weekly Talmud classes. The congregation has even produced its own CD. Of the 115 family and single members, 13 joined this year.

"We're known to be a warm shul," said Silverberg. "We're heimishe. We pride ourselves on the quality of our davening and our divrei Torah. We're also a community of people who care for one another, share in each other's simchahs and support each other through difficult times."

Joel Eisen, membership chair and a past president, spoke of being "overwhelmed and so moved" by the support he received when his father died, with shivah visits from members whose faces he knew but whose names he didn't. "I think that's a common phenomenon."

Eisen, 47, said the congregation also has a history of being involved in community causes. One of up to a dozen psychiatrists who are involved in Beth Haminyan, Eisen said the affiliation with the psychotrauma centre in Israel solidified members' connection with Israel.

Tickets for the anniversary fundraiser ($100 each, and partially tax deductible) are available through Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital, 416-256-4222.

Jews who sold the artifacts were impoverished

"This was not tomb robbery," observed Irwin. "These were all commercial transactions, bought and paid for with money."

The Jews who sold the artifacts were impoverished, much like China itself during this turbulent era of war, floods and famine.

Bishop White, who had a deep interest in China's history and culture, never forgot his encounters with the Jews of Kaifeng. He wrote a book about them, and in 1942, the University of Toronto published Chinese Jews, now out of print.

Chinese synagogue

The ROM's collection of Chinese Jewish artifacts is eclectic. It includes:

• Ink rubbings of a 15th century stone stele commemorate the rebuilding of the synagogue in 1489. The actual stele, which once stood in the courtyard of the synagogue, is in China's possession. According to Irwin, the inscription on the stele is the earliest evidence that the Kaifeng community – "discovered" by the Jesuits in the 17th century – actually existed.

• Gray limestone bowls and a drain mouth, decorated with lotus leaf reliefs, which were used in ceremonial hand-washing.

• Sandstone basins, with relief figures of vines and lotus flowers, also for hand-washing.

• A black, cloud-shaped slate chime stone, inscribed with four Chinese characters meaning "Jade chime stone of spiritual brightness," which was rung to summon people to prayer.

• A Ming dynasty-era wooden Torah case that is covered with a fine fabric, coated with a few layers of what is now a reddish-brown lacquer, and is gilded.

• Three leaves from the Book of Genesis and a leaf from a new year's prayer, both hand-written in Hebrew on thick Chinese paper.

The ROM displayed these artifacts in a temporary exhibition titled Precious Legacy in the early 1980s.

During the 1970s, the artifacts were on long-term loan to Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple, and in 1984, they were sent to the Museum of the Diaspora in Tel Aviv.

Liberal MP calls for gov't. to be more pro-Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Canada should have voted against a United Nations resolution calling for the International Court of Justice to adjudicate Israel's security fence, says Montreal member of Parliament Marlene Jennings.

"I do not think the International Court is the proper venue for any contestation or opposition to the security fence," Jennings said last week at an invitation-only briefing organized by the Quebec-Israel Committee and Women's Federation CJA. Canada was among 74 countries that abstained, while eight voted against the resolution.

"Israel is the victim and must be allowed to determine what measures it deems appropriate for its security… There has been a significant reduction in the loss of lives since the fence was built," Jennings said.

Abstention, she said, leaves the impression that "Canada is not opposed to the basic core issue, but [to] some secondary issue it might have."

Jennings, MP for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine since 1997, criticized the "inconsistencies" in Canada's policy on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which she said has become less sympathetic to Israel over the past 10 years. This shift is reflected in Canada's voting record at the UN, where it has "fallen into the trap of favouring or abstaining from resolutions that are clearly anti-democratic and politicized."

Jennings called for a more "proportionate response" from Canada when Israel reacts militarily to Palestinian violence.

"Israel is subject to, is the victim of, terrorist attacks and has the right to defend its people and its land, and to decide the level of that response," she said.

"How is it that when the U.S. was attacked on its land on 9/11, Canada was one of the leading governments to support its decision to take military action [against Afghanistan]?" she asked, yet does not offer similar support to Israel.

The basis of Canada's policy on conflict should be recognition that Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East, she said. "If we consider democracy important, we have to support the democracy that exists… Protection of human rights and democracy has to be the prism through which we view any question on the Middle East."

That does not means, she added, that "everything the government of Israel does is perfect," and she favours a Palestinian state.

However, while Canada should recognize the Palestinian Authority, it should not recognize Yasser Arafat as the Palestinians' "legitimate representative," Jennings said.

Canada should take the lead in "de-politicizing" UN agencies, starting with the General Assembly, the Commission on Human Rights and the UNRWA, she said.

"We can use our bilateral relations with Jordan, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait to push an agenda for the respect of human rights in their own territory and for peace and democracy in the area. We, Canadians, are seen as agents of peace in the world."

Jennings was one of 12 MPs and senators who submitted a policy proposal last June titled Canada & the Middle East that calls for more sympathetic treatment of Israel. Canada's foreign policy is currently under a comprehensive review. They banded together because they felt their individual representations to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien or the foreign affairs committee were not being heeded, she said.

With the new Paul Martin government, Jennings said she is optimistic about change, noting that five of the signatories of the proposal are now in cabinet.

"This does not mean there will suddenly be a change, but I am hopeful [the proposal] will have an impact in shaping Canada's foreign policy."

Foreign Affairs Canada "will have to deal with this document now," she said. "They can't throw it in the garbage… If policy does not reflect our recommendations, there will have to be an explanation. At least the bureaucracy is being force to look at them and will have to decide yes or no. So it is already having an impact."

Jennings related how a Foreign Affairs official called her assistant last June, asking if she thought the MP "really wanted her name on this document."

"It gives you an idea of the mindset of our bureaucracy. I'm seen as on the left-wing of the party; ergo, I must automatically be pro-Palestinian."

New Jewish student paper launched in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With last week's release of the first issue of Sabra, Winnipeg's Jewish students gained a new pro-Israel voice on campus.

The eight-page first edition of the newspaper, a project of the Winnipeg Zionist Initiative (WZI), contains articles, essays and reviews written largely by Jewish students and professors at the University of Winnipeg and the University of Manitoba.

"Our purpose in launching Sabra was mainly to show non-Jewish university students a different side of Israel that is not shown in the university student newspapers or the regular daily papers," said WZI executive director Liat Arieh.

"A lot of students, as well as members of the general Jewish community, are frustrated by the bias in the media against Israel. It was important for us to do something. This helps redress the balance."

Natalie Bjorklund, a mature student at the University of Manitoba who wrote an article in the first issue," said she has been "very unhappy with the bias against Israel that I see in the university newspapers here. I see our paper as a way to counteract that."

Zach Schnitzer, a third-year arts student at the University of Winnipeg who also contributed to the first issue, said he is new to the issues that Sabra and world Jewry are dealing with.

"I'm hoping to learn from this and perhaps some of the readers can learn something from my perspective."

The inaugural front page features an interview with an Israeli Bedouin who visited both universities in October on a North American speaking tour. In other stories, Schnitzer outlines his efforts to understand the issues and a young Winnipegger gives a first-hand report describing what it's like to be living in Israel amid ongoing terror attacks.

Bjorklund's piece analyzes how to tell whether criticism of Israel is legitimate or a mask for anti-Semitism. There are also a couple of stories by non-Jewish students about their experiences in Israel, as well as a review of the movie Relentless – about Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's duplicity concerning the Oslo accords – and a column listing new Israeli scientific discoveries.

The paper is rounded out by two research articles by professors and write-ups of programs for students in Israel.

Besides its educative role, Sabra will help students develop writing and research skills, and it will foster future advocates for Israel, Arieh said.

The WZI has arranged to print 5,000 copies of Sabra's first issue. Two thousand will be distributed to subscribers of the Jewish Post and News, Winnipeg's Jewish weekly, while the rest will be handed out on campus by student volunteers.

The next issue is scheduled for late February, and a third is slated for late March. Arieh hopes new contributors will be inspired to submit essays and articles to future editions.

Two new war crimes cases launched

Lovett said the Crown is seeking leave to appeal a decision by an Ontario Superior Court judge in the case of Helmut Oberlander, who was a translator with an Einsatzkommando killing squad. Judge Robert Reilly ruled recently he had jurisdiction to consider constitutional issues involving the way the federal cabinet, sitting as governor-in-council, removed Oberlander's citizenship. The Crown opposed the Superior Court's assumption of jurisdiction, arguing a Federal Court last summer upheld the cabinet's decision and that Oberlander should not be free to shop for another legal forum in which to challenge the decision.

Lovett said the Crown's leave application will be heard on March 5 by another judge of the Superior Court. Should the application succeed, the Crown will be entitled to appeal Reilly's ruling to the Divisional Court. Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Ed Morgan said Congress would seek intervenor status at that stage of the process. Congress has not yet decided whether it would seek intervenor status if the leave application fails and the case is sent back to Reilly's court.

Should the leave application be turned down, Reilly will have jurisdiction to hear Oberlander's challenge to the cabinet's decision-making process.

Some of the earlier cases have been stalled at the cabinet level despite Federal Court rulings in the Crown's favour. Of the seven ongoing cases, the Crown has been successful in six instances of convincing the Federal Court that the Nazi war crime suspect obtained Canadian citizenship by lying.

The seventh case, involving Vancouver resident Michael Seifert, is proceeding on two tracks: in one, the Crown is moving to strip Seifert of his citizenship. That case has not yet been heard in court. In a parallel extradition proceeding, another court found in August 2003 there was enough evidence to warrant Seifert's removal to Italy. Seifert is appealing that decision.

Other active cases include those involving Wasyl Odynsky, Jacob Fast, Walter Obodzinsky, Vladimir Katriuk and Michael Baumgartner.

On March 2, 2001, Judge Andrew Mackay of the Federal Court found Odynsky concealed his service as a guard at the SS forced labour camps of Trawniki and Poniatowa. That opened the door to the removal of Odynsky's citizenship, though Odynsky offered submissions to the minister of citizenship arguing against revocation. The minister is in the process of determining whether to recommend to the governor-in-council that Odynsky should lose his citizenship, Lovett said.

Katriuk was found by a Federal Court to have served in Schutzmannschaft Battalion 118, which took part in anti-partisan actions in Ukraine, and was found to have lied about those activities when he obtained citizenship. The Federal Court of Appeal dismissed Katriuk's subsequent appeal and in May 2000, the Supreme Court of Canada dismissed Katriuk's application for leave to appeal. Katriuk has made submissions to the minister arguing against revocation and the minister is deciding whether to recommend revocation, Lovett said.

Fast is alleged to have served as the head, or as a member, of the political department of the Nazi Auxiliary Police in Zaporozhye, Ukraine. On Oct. 3, 2003, a Federal Court judge in Hamilton ruled Fast obtained his citizenship by fraud when he failed to reveal his wartime collaboration in enforcing racial policies. Fast is expected to make submissions to the minister explaining why he believes his case should not be considered by the governor-in-council.

On Sept. 18, 2003 a Federal Court in Montreal found Obodzinsky lied when obtaining his citizenship. The Crown had alleged Obodzinsky was a member of a Schuma police battalion in the towns of Turets and Mir in what is now Belarus and following that, served in an attack unit (Jagdzug) under Nazi command in the Belarussian city of Baranovichi. Obodzinsky is expected to make submissions to the minister prior to the minister's recommendation on revocation, Lovett said.

In the Baumgartner case, a Federal Court in Windsor found in August 2001 that Baumgartner served as a volunteer in the Waffen SS and also served as a concentration camp guard at the Stutthof and Sachsenhausen Concentration camps. The minster is now in a position to recommend whether to revoke Baumgartner's citizenship, though that recommendation has not yet been made, Lovett said.

Lovett would not comment on the slow pace of activity once cases have been referred to the Minister, though she said the war crimes unit was working as fast as it could to advance the process.

Envoy briefly exits Martin Luther King observance

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

A representative from the Muslim community said there was "nothing inappropriate" in comments he made about Israel during an interfaith ceremony honouring Martin Luther King Jr. that caused Israel's consul general to walk out.

David Birnbaum, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), also walked out, but while Rahman was still talking.

Both later returned after meeting in the lobby with the church's Rev. Darryl Gray.

"[Rahman] cynically took advantage of his right to speak to attack the State of Israel," Attali said in an interview, stressing that he was criticizing Rahman as an individual and not as a Muslim.

"Let me put it this way: what he said was inappropriate and totally in conflict with the spirit of brotherhood and conciliation the event was meant to be, to turn it into a political event."

According to Attali and Birnbaum, Rahman, among other things, referred to the "brutal Israeli occupation" of Palestinian land and to the Jan. 13 death of British student Tom Hurndall, an activist with the pro-Palestinian International Solidarity Movement.

Hurndall was shot in April 2003 by an Israel Defence Forces soldier in Gaza and lay in a coma until his death. The soldier implicated in the shooting is facing manslaughter charges in Israel.

Rahman said his remarks were intended to draw a parallel between the death of two activists, King and Hurndall, who both used "non-violent resistance."

But, Birnbaum said, "he very rudely and disrespectfully tried to turn an honourable event into a partisan propaganda piece."

Attali said he did not leave the hall at the same time as Birnbaum because he wanted to hear all of what Rahman had to say.

When the editor finished speaking, Attali, who was seated in the first row, approached the moderator to respond at the microphone.

"Rahman was standing next to me, and I said to him and the audience that I was disappointed that some people take the opportunity to launch accusation and to turn freedom of speech into an indictment of the State of Israel," he said.

After he finished, Attali walked out of the hall, but he told The CJN that he had intended to return.

"Sometimes, we have to do things to show people how we feel as Israelis and as Jews."

Attali said following the ceremony, members of the audience walked up to him, shook his hand, and said, "Well done!"

Birnbaum said he and Rahman exchanged perfunctory pleasantries before the ceremony, which consisted of testimonials and readings from King's writings, but added he "had to interrupt" when the Israel-bashing began.

Before walking out, Birnbaum twice called out from his seat, "Please honour Dr. King."

The text of Attali's remarks, which he delivered before Rahman's address, underscored the strong sympathies King held for the Jewish people and for Zionism in the context of their common struggle against discrimination and for self-determination.

Attali quoted a comment King made not long before his death: "When people criticize Zionists, they mean Jews."

Attali and Birnbaum said when Rev. Gray spoke with them in the lobby, he seemed upset by what happened and asked them to return to the hall. Birnbaum said Rev. Gray appeared to sincerely regret that a ceremony to honour King's legacy had tuned into a "political" event.

Rev. Gray could not be reached for comment.

The event was one of two organized by the Martin Luther King Legacy Committee and one of two that saw the participation of the Jewish community.

On Jan. 14, CJC-Q vice-president Frank Schlesinger attended an interfaith prayer breakfast at Montreal City hall, an event also chaired by Rev. Gray.

Birnbaum said a similar incident occurred last year at the King commemoration when a diplomatic representative of the Palestinian Authority in Ottawa also used the occasion to further the Palestinian cause.

The PA representative criticized Israel and placed a keffiyah around Rev. Gray's shoulders, Birnbaum said.

Despite this year's incident, which Attali reported to Jerusalem, Attali said he would not think twice about returning next year.

Controversial shirt on sale in Mtl.

MONTREAL — The Urban Outfitters clothing chain has repeated a promise to pull a T-shirt with the phrase "Everyone Loves a Jewish Girl" surrounded by dollar signs, hearts and handbags after the shirt was spotted at a Montreal store, but said it will do so only after selling off the line.

The Philadelphia-based chain had agreed to produce a modified version of the shirt without the dollar signs after a complaint earlier this month from the Anti-Defamation League, which said the shirt "reinforced a negative association between Jews and money and, as such, perpetuated an offensive stereotype."

But last week, B'nai Brith Canada called on the company to immediately pull the remaining shirts from its shelves after the advocacy group received a complaint from a student who saw them last Thursday at an outlet on Ste. Catherine Street in downtown Montreal.

The shirts are part of the chain's ethnic line of T-shirts featuring German, Irish and Italian girl logos with images of beer, shamrock and pizza, respectively.

Urban Outfitters president Richard Hayne told the Montreal Gazette he didn't know when the new shirts would reach stores.

"We agreed to take the dollar signs off and just keep it as it is otherwise. And it will say, 'Everyone loves a Jewish girl,'" Hayne said.

"Our agreement with [the ADL] was that we would sell out what we have and that when we printed the new ones they would be different."

B'nai Brith wasn't satisfied with that response. "If it's not appropriate to continue to produce the offensive material, it's not appropriate to sell it," spokesperson Joseph Ben-Ami told the Gazette.

The outlet's assistant manager, Bram Levinson, told The CJN that the store was inundated by calls after a Gazette story on the shirt ran last Friday – not from outraged members of the Jewish community, but from what appeared to be Jewish teenage girls demanding them.

"They're selling like crazy," he said.

Levinson, who is Jewish, said the T-shirts should be taken as they were intended – "tongue-in-cheek."

He said if they do promote a stereotype, it's more that of the "Jewish princess" than of the avaricious Jew.

"People have to look at this with a sense of humour."

Levinson said he only has 10 T-shirts left in stock and expects future shipments to no longer have the controversial dollar sign.

Watch for more scrutiny of Israel's security fence

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The media attention focused on Israel's controversial security fence will no doubt continue to grow as the issue works its way to the International Court of Justice (ICJ) for hearings beginning Feb. 23. To follow what promises to be heightened critical scrutiny requires an understanding of both the fence itself and the limitations of the international justice system.

The CJN's Jan. 15 editorial "In a threat, the irony of truth" made an essential point: "The inescapable first and last principle about the security fence is this: had there been no terror, there would be no fence. The fence was brought to the Palestinians, like most of the misery in their lives, by their leader Yasser Arafat."

Much of the controversy is about the route of the fence, especially its variance from the pre-June 1967 "Green Line" and its extension, at points, into the West Bank.

In "A fence that minimizes harm," (Ha'aretz, Jan. 21), Ze'ev Schiff notes that even former prime minister Ehud Barak rejects the idea of building the fence on the Green Line. Schiff summarizes Barak's view: "[He] opposes building the fence on the pre-1967 border. The only thing Israel can give the Palestinians in exchange for concessions on their part, he argues, is territory. Therefore, it is a mistake to make this concession in the context of building a protective fence, rather than in the context of comprehensive negotiations. In his opinion, it is better for the fence to protrude into the West Bank, so that Israel will have something to concede in the final-status negotiations." Historian Michael Oren made the same point at a November meeting with journalists in Toronto.

While Schiff recommends a number of route modifications, he concludes: "Will these changes produce greater understanding in Europe for the steps that Israel is taking to defend itself? Unfortunately, the answer is 'No.' The dominant line in many places is that Israel has no right even to defend itself."

Many Israelis and international legal authorities are correct when they say the fence is a political issue that can only be resolved through negotiations involving Israelis and Palestinians. The issue does not lend itself to precise rulings on international legal disputes, which the ICJ was established to make.

This point was made in an op-ed piece titled "Keep the courts out of this territory," by University of Toronto law professor Ed Morgan (National Post, Jan. 15). Morgan writes: "There is either no legal answer to whether or not Canada/Quebec, Israel/Palestine, China/Tibet, Russia/Chechnya, Ireland/Ulster, etc. should have a border between [them] – or there is a legal answer that someone will forever dispute. Either way, the credibiliy of the law is undermined."

Israelis are not indifferent to the controversy surrounding the fence's route. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, while confirming that the fence will provide security to Jewish communities east of the Green Line, has acknowledged that minor modifications might be possible. Sharon has also said that the fence should be constructed in a way that minimizes the hardship to the Palestinians.

A realistic appraisal of the situation, however, must be guided by two essential facts: First, the UN General Assembly's appeal to the ICJ – on the instigation of the Palestinians – was motivated less by legal considerations than by the goal of embarrassing and delegitimizing Israel. Second, nothing short of Israel dismantling the security fence and complying with all of the Palestinians' territorial demands will likely stem the tide of criticism from much of the international media.

Multifaith Israel trip supercedes Mideast conflict

Rana El-Sayed and Elenna Mosoff – a Muslim student and a Jewish student – were among the campus leaders who took part in a recent trip to Israel run by National Jewish Campus Life, a department of UIA Federations Canada, and Canada Israel Experience. Below are their reflections on the experience.

By RANA EL-SAYED
Special to The CJN

For a few moments, let's put negatives aside. Writing about the Middle East without dealing with its politics is a difficult task. But I am going to attempt to show the miracle that is the Middle East with no politics attached.

This past December, I was given the opportunity of a lifetime. I was one of 13 student leaders chosen from across Canada to go to Israel and experience the wonders, myths and realities of Israel first-hand. The purpose of the trip was to educate university students about the realities of Israel from a wide variety of perspectives. While I took away a great deal of information, the most important piece of knowledge I brought back was how to listen to everything, not just what I wanted to hear – a skill I think a lot of people need to learn.

On Friday Dec. 19, the first day of Chanukah, we headed down to the Old City of Jerusalem from our hotel. After going through a security checkpoint where we went through metal detectors, we made our way to the Western Wall. Due to bad weather, there were only a few people there, but those few people made quite an impression on me. I saw a number of rabbis dancing and singing, celebrating the Sabbath as well as the beginning of Chanukah. On the women's side of the wall, there was a group of young women walking backward from the wall, having just prayed. (It is customary not to turn your back to the wall.)

As I stood there taking in this scene of celebration and ritual, I heard something to my left. It took me a few seconds to figure out that it was the bells from the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The combination of these two sounds was remarkable, but seconds later, my emotions got the best of me when the call to prayer from the Al-Aqsa Mosque began. These three sounds in perfect harmony brought tears to my eyes. For a few minutes, I forgot about the hate, the fighting, and the conflict that I had learned so much about in the past few days. If only every moment in Israel and the occupied territories could be this peaceful and harmonious.

This country provided me with a sense of spirituality that I had never experienced before. The feeling that overcomes a person while standing in the Old City is beyond words. To see, hear and virtually feel the unity of all three religions co-existing for even a few seconds brought tears to my eyes, because I knew that as soon as I walked away from this moment, reality would set back in.

Being back in Canada and reflecting on my time in Israel has been difficult. I find myself torn between wanting to do more in the fight for peace and maintaining my peace of mind and walking away. For now, I am just learning more about all the groups on campus that deal with the Israeli-Palestine conflict. As a not-very-religious Muslim who grew up in Brantford, Ont., I have very few personal connections to either side and feel as though I could help decrease the tension and open lines of communication. If there is one thing I can truly say, it that people just do not listen to each other.

Politics aside

By ELENNA MOSOFF
Special to The CJN

In December 2002, I took a chance on a trip to Israel sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto that focused on advocacy. When I returned, I became involved in Hillel and in other Jewish causes at the University of Toronto. This winter, I went on another trip to Israel that was drastically different. It included 12 other student leaders from across the country, all of whom were not Jewish.

I knew the trip was being funded in part by UIA Federations Canada, a Jewish organization. I feared that the itinerary would be entirely biased and detrimental to Israel's cause in the eyes of those non-Jewish participants.

Yet once engrossed in the activities, I was proved very wrong.

The most significant part of the trip was our tour of Jerusalem's Old City. As a comparative religion major, it was an invaluable opportunity to explore various religious sites in the city. Enhancing this experience was the way each person in our diverse group was affected by the holy sites they were religiously and spiritually connected to. It made me excited when my Muslim friend's eyes shone with delight each time she heard the call to prayer from the mosques, and when the boys, who seemed to be engrossed only in watching the Israeli women, made an immediate emotional turn in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. On no other Israel trip I have taken have I had such an opportunity, as every other trip was made up entirely of Jews and was geared toward that audience.

Also, on no other trip funded by a Jewish organization would I have had the opportunity to hear from such a diverse group of speakers. The reason for this diversity was to allow

'Peace' club just another propaganda tool

By MICHAEL TWEYMAN

Guest Voice

The CJN's recent article about a new student club at York University ("Shalom-Salam: a calm in the campus storm," Jan. 8) was remarkably naïve. Despite its name – "Shalom-Salam," or "Peace-Peace" – this club has nothing to do with peace, and everything to do with anti-Israel propaganda that helps to legitimate violence against the Jewish state. The club is a public relations vehicle for Palestinians, and its Jewish members have happily taken the bait.

Jewish students should resist what, to quote the article, seems like a beautiful utopia, with Jews and Arabs "underneath peace banners depicting Israeli and Palestinian flags [although the club does not recognize either banner] joined together with an image of a handshake."

Not only is this club ludicrous, it is also dangerous. This point was touched on very briefly near the end of the article, but it actually merited a lot more attention. In effect, the club is an implicit admission by Jewish students that both sides have made mistakes in the ongoing conflict between Israelis and Palestinians and that Jews and Arabs are equally responsible for it.

But the reality is that the Palestinians started this war deliberately and have mainly targeted innocent Jews with vicious suicide bombs. "Shalom-Salam" is simply another tactic to help create sympathy for the Palestinians and legitimize the murder of Jewish civilians. Supporting peace means telling the truth and denouncing terror as morally wrong, not running away hopelessly from the issues to hug pro-Palestinian students.

The crucial point is that this club essentially stands for nothing. I would have tremendous respect for Arab students at York if they were at the forefront of rejecting terror and violence and unequivocally proclaimed Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state. But the truth is the opposite. A knowledgeable source has said that while the club is "a nice idea in theory, [it] is in practice dominated by the militant, anti-Israel left, making those Jewish students who participate nothing more than useful fools for their propaganda purposes."

Some of the club's Arab members are known to be among the most rabid anti-Israel activists on campus, and they will likely use their membership as a rebuttal whenever anyone accuses them of being anti-Israel. Thus, their views about, for example, "so-called Palestinian terror attacks" and "Israel the colonial oppressor" can be all-the-more readily accepted by saying, "We just want peace. Look at this club we started with Jews. Jews wouldn't start a club with us if we're so bad." Wrong.

In any case, this tactic should sound all too familiar. It is the exact same one Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat used when he agreed to the Oslo accords in public and then continued being viciously anti-Israel in private.

As for Jewish students draping themselves in the Palestinian flag, this practice should also be condemned. It is not as simple as putting differences aside. The truth is that the Palestinian flag has symbolism, and part of that symbolism is terror, murder, the destruction of many Jewish families and the goal of destroying Israel.

By now, it should be clear that this war is about something more than just "ending the occupation." We must all acknowledge the simple truth that Jews are being killed simply for being Jews, and that Arabs were terrorizing Jews in Israel long before 1967 and after 1995, when "occupation" of civilians ended and 99 per cent of Palestinians lived in autonomous Palestinian areas. Only the disappearance of Israel and its people will appease many of the Palestinians.

As is the case with "Shalom-Salam," the truth often lies beneath the surface. And as the Oslo accords have shown us, only living in the real world can lead to security for the Jewish people. This is one lesson that members of "Shalom-Salam" and other like-minded Jews have yet to learn, even though the Palestinians are doing their best to teach them.

Israel trip raises tough questions each of the participants to ask questions. Part of me felt I had been chosen for the trip to help answer some of the questions non-Jewish participants might have had about Judaism.

I recognized the value of the trip for those non-Jewish participants on one of our first nights in Jerusalem. We were gathered at a traditional Israeli restaurant and one of the participants asked about keeping kosher. The discussion moved from the laws and practices of kashrut to the observance of Shabbat to army bases. The conversation lasted a good two hours. As I looked around the table, I swelled with pride. Here I was, in Israel, a very significant place for me as a Jew, sitting with a group of fellow student leaders of all backgrounds representing the diversity of Canada, and sharing, listening, talking and answering the tough questions that we never seem to have the opportunity in our daily lives to ask.

I am a better person because of this trip. I am a better person because I experienced Israel through the eyes of outsiders. I challenge my fellow Jews to make time for questions and to give the answers to someone who is not part of our community. You may be surprised. There may be more questions that arise for you as a result of your conversation. Don't be afraid: just because we're Jewish doesn't mean we have all the answers. I definitely didn't.

הגדר

Barbarian Invasion הוא סרטו של דניס ארקאנד, האיש שעשה את "נפילתה של האימפריה האמריקנית" לפני כחמש עשרה שנה. היה בהחלט שווה לחכות לְסרט דובר הצרפתית ממונטריאול. במרכזו עומד המפגש בין פרופסור אוניברסיטה חולה סרטן לבין בנו, שנחשב על ידי האב ללא יוצלח, אך הוא עכשיו איש עסקים מאוד עשיר. הסיפור מרתק מאוד, ויש בסרט דיאלוגים מדהימים. הסרט עומד בניגוד גמור לשטחיות שנודפת מרוב הסרטים שמגיעים מהוליווד. זה כמו לקרוא ספר טוב. עשר בסולם קורן.

Hillel reaches out to high school students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Hillel of Greater Toronto and Beth Tikvah Synagogue have joined forces to present an eight-part lecture series for students entering university and their families.

"Being Jewish On Campus" begins Feb. 3 with Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, discussing "Anti-semitism and Anti-Zionism: Two Converging Hatreds."

Zac Kaye, Hillel's executive director, has wanted for a long time to reach out to high school students, especially regarding Jewish identity and Israel affairs on campus, said Tilly Shames, Hillel's director of Israel affairs and a co-ordinator of the program.

Along the same lines, Hillel and the Canada-Israel Committee have organized visits by Hillel students to upper-year high school students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot.

The series at Beth Tikvah, however, will offer a "greater sense of Israel education and Jewish education" than a one-time advocacy event would, said Shames.

Organizers hope that students who attend will arrive at university "at a level where they're more informed about the issues they'll be facing on campus," she said. They also hope to "pave the way for [student] involvement and understanding that there is a community on campus for them, so they don't feel isolated as a Jewish student on campus."

The sessions will run on Feb. 3, 10, 19 and 24, and on Mar. 2, 9, 23 and 30. Pre-registration for one or all sessions can be arranged through Beth Tikvah.

Hillel is also running a Jewish "university fair" at Beth Tikvah on Feb. 10 from 3 to 8 p.m. The information fair will feature tables with literature about various universities, as well as about their Hillels.

York U election saga ends with victory for Hillel-backed slate

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Now that Paul Cooper is officially president of the York Federation of Students (YFS), he says his first priority is to reform the student government election process.

After two months of uncertainty and limbo following the Nov. 26 election, Cooper's slate, Progress Not Politics (PNP), was finally ratified last Thursday night by the YFS council. The slate won 27 of 32 positions in the election, including all four executive positions. On Friday morning, Cooper gained access to the YFS offices in an "entirely peaceful" transition, according to Bonnie Neuman, vice-president of students.

Earlier in the week, the PNP (represented by Cooper and two others) and a constituency committee made up of York's college presidents, representing the YFS board, entered into mediation, supervised by York's Office of Student Affairs.

The committee did not have the power to ratify the election results. The YFS council voted to ratify with 16 people in favour and 11 abstentions.

"I'm happy we were finally ratified," Cooper told The CJN last week. "I don't think it should have taken this long. I'm glad this whole debacle is over. It was a shame it had to happen in the first place. I'm glad to finally be able to do the work I was elected to do."

Cooper, whose slate was backed by Hillel, promised to reorient YFS' focus toward student issues such as parking, security and tuition. The federation, Hillel charged, had become increasingly involved in anti-Israel activities.

Ratification, usually a formality, was initially delayed by a YFS elections committee hearing on Dec. 4 to determine whether Cooper's campaign literature expenses violated campaign spending regulations.

The complaints were dismissed, but ratification was delayed again at a Dec. 15 meeting of the outgoing YFS council when a member of the elections committee alleged that she was intimidated into abstaining on Dec. 4. The other three members had voted in Cooper's favour.

Once classes resumed in January, Cooper's acquittal was overturned in a YFS council meeting. Following that, the administration assumed financial trusteeship of the YFS and stopped transferring the money it collects from student levies on the council's behalf.

"Now we'll be doing the job we were elected to do, but doing it in the YFS office and with the credibility we need.," said Cooper. "We want to restore credibility to this organization and make it function the way it should for students."

"We're very pleased to see this come to a closure, and we are very happy that our students are the ones who ultimately came up with the solution," Neuman said.

The abstentions, she believes, indicate that Cooper's opponents have "moved from refusals to abstentions… I think that was a recognition that it was time to move forward and get on with the job of providing services to students, which is what student government is all about."

Normally, YFS elections are held in the spring, but because of the controversy and the fact the November vote had already been delayed, Neuman recommends waiting until next year before students return to the polls.

"Obviously we need some electoral reform, and I think that should be done carefully and cautiously to make sure we get it right," she said. "My recommendation is to look at a full election with transfer of government being next January."

Israel begins two-stage prisoner trade with Hezbollah

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Soldiers from the rabbinical branch of the Israel Defence Forces began Monday to exhume the remains of Lebanese militants buried in northern Israel as part of a prisoner exchange with Hezbollah that is taking place this week.

The cemetery, at the Amiad army base north of Lake Kinneret, has been used for Lebanese killed in clashes with Israeli soldiers.

Part of the prisoner exchange swap arranged with Hezbollah includes the return to Lebanon of the bodies of members of the Iranian-backed group killed in fighting with Israel.

Haredi soldiers removed numbered metal grave markers from each burial site before removing the bodies.

The swap is seeing the handover Thursday by Hezbollah of Israeli businessman Elhanan Tennenbaum and the bodies of three IDF soldiers – Benny Avraham, Adi Avitan and Omar Suwad – kidnapped in October 2000.

In return, Israel is releasing Friday 435 Arabs held in its jails – 400 Palestinians, 23 Lebanese and 12 nationals of other countries – as well as the bodies of 59 Lebanese who were buried in Israel.

Israel will also provide any information it has on 24 Lebanese who have been missing since 1982 and maps of mines laid by the Israeli army in Lebanese territory.

The German government, which played a key role in mediating the deal, has also promised to free two Lebanese and an Iranian currently serving life sentences in Germany, and also to try to persuade France and Switzerland to release Lebanese prisoners they hold, in exchange for the return of missing Israel Air Force navigator Ron Arad or his body.

The second stage of the exchange deals with the attempt to find information about Arad and bring him back to Israel. A joint German-Hezbollah committee will be set up to conduct the search for information, with indirect help from "other sources" – an apparent reference to Iran.

If solid information is obtained – meaning DNA samples to confirm his identity and proof of whether he is alive or dead – Israel will release Samir Kuntar, the only Lebanese prisoner who is not being freed this week, and also the only one convicted of murdering civilians in Israel rather than soldiers in Lebanon.

However, the agreement is deliberately vague on this point, saying in another place that Kuntar will be released once the discussion of his case ends, and that the parties hope this will be in two to three months.

> If Arad is located, negotiations will begin over his return

If Arad is located, negotiations will begin over his return to Israel. Any deal would include the release of the three prisoners held in Germany, all of whom were involved in the murder of an Iranian dissident in a Berlin restaurant in 1992. Israel will also have to release additional Arab prisoners, mainly Palestinians.

Once the joint committee is established – which is supposed to be this week – Israel will also give it any information it has relating to the disappearance of four Iranian diplomats in Beirut in 1982.

Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, who gave a press conference in Beirut to announce the deal, said the second stage will begin immediately after Friday's exchange.

"Four Israeli prisoners are not sufficient for a comprehensive agreement, because there are additional Israelis in Lebanon," he explained.

Specifically, he said, Hezbollah believes Arad is in Lebanon, and not in Iran, as Israel believes.

"If the Arad affair ends positively," Nasrallah said, Israel will release a large quantity of other prisoners, who, he hinted, may include Israeli Arabs as well as Palestinians.

"Israel has expressed willingness to pay a heavy price if the second stage goes well," he said.

If Israel fails to implement the second stage, he said, Hezbollah will continue to kidnap Israeli soldiers.

In Israel, President Moshe Katsav said Monday he was willing to pay "any price" for Arad's release, including the release of terrorists.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz on Sunday told a meeting of the Manufacturers Association in Tel Aviv that "today, Israel is closer than ever to the possibility of obtaining real information about the fate of Ron Arad.

"We will not rest until we have brought all the captives and MIAs home: Ron Arad, Zacharia Baumel, Yehuda Katz, Zvi Feldman and Guy Hever. The deal ties Ron Arad's fate to the next stage of implementation. But I say that very cautiously, because we are dealing with a very cruel enemy.

"This is the best deal we could achieve under the present conditions," Mofaz said. "The price we had to pay for the return of Elhanan Tennenbaum and the three soldiers was extremely high… The decision was difficult but, in my opinion, correct."

As Mofaz made those comments, the IDF and the prisons service prepared for the first stage of the exchange, finalizing the list of 400 Palestinian prisoners to be released and exhuming and readying the bodies for transfer to Lebanon. The final list of prisoners to be released was published on the prisons service's website Monday night, in case anyone who chose could petition the High Court of Justice against a particular release. (It is considered very unlikely the court would uphold such a petition.)

According to Israeli sources, which Palestinians will be released is entirely at Israel's discretion and Hezbollah will have no say in the matter. The only prisoners the cabinet will release are those with less than two years still to serve and without "blood on their hands." But Israel promised Hezbollah that only security prisoners, as opposed to ordinary criminals, will be included in the deal. Many of those to be freed will be administrative detainees rather than convicted prisoners.

Nasrallah said in his press conference that Hezbollah's key achievement in the deal was Israel's agreement to release Palestinian prisoners and not just Lebanese. The Palestinians, he said, will be released to their homes in the territories and not be deported to other places.

Israel and Ethiopia deepen bilateral ties

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom spent three days in Ethiopia earlier this month promoting bilateral diplomatic and economic relations between the two countries.

For the past 13 years, Israel and Ethiopia have exchanged ambassadors. However, the past few months have seen a flurry of activity with a visit to Jerusalem by Ethiopian Foreign Minister Seyoum Mesfin, followed by Shalom's recent trip to Ethiopia.

An entourage of businesspeople from 20 Israeli companies, including representatives from the agricultural and telecommunications industries, accompanied the official delegation.

Israel now considers developing its relationship with Africa to be an important diplomatic endeavor, said Miriam Ziv, a senior Israeli Foreign Affairs spokesperson who accompanied Shalom on his trip.

Clearly, Ethiopia and Israel have a historical basis for friendship, Ziv told The CJN.

Ancient legends trace the origins of the Ethiopian kingdom to a child, Menelik – born to the Queen of Sheba and King Solomon – who returned to Ethiopia from Jerusalem with the Ark of the Covenant. A copy of the ark is replicated at the centre of every Ethiopian Orthodox church and Magen Davids appear on many historic monuments. Books and movies have been devoted to exploring links between the ancient ark and an isolated church on the shores of Lake Tana in northern Ethiopia.

More recently, Ziv pointed out that Israel had good working relationships with many African countries until the 1973 Yom Kippur War, when most severed ties to show affinity for Egypt, a member of the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

"Many African leaders fondly remember seeing Israelis working on their farms," Ziv said.

In 1991, Israel renewed relations with Ethiopia when Marxist dictator Mengistu Haile Mariam's government fell to the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front.

Since then, Israel has come to realize Africa's economic importance as an emerging market and the significance of developing friendships with sub-Saharan countries. Uganda and Rwanda have recently improved ties, and last year Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni visited Israel.

The African Union (the former OAU) passes about 50 resolutions annually dealing with their continent and one about the Middle East.

"When it comes to the Middle East, the language is horrible," Ziv said. "Not once have they condemned terror against Israelis. It's all terrible. In 2001, there was a resolution that even paid tribute to the intifadah."

More attention was clearly needed to develop understanding between Israel and the 54 African countries.

In recent developments, Ziv suspects that Ethiopia's vote at the United Nations against sending the security fence issue to the International Court of Justice (ICJ) at the Hague was probably based on concern over its own border dispute with Eritrea, a country with whom Israel also enjoys good relations.

"Ethiopia understood these types of problems shouldn't be dealt with at the ICJ," Ziv said, adding she was encouraged by the fact that Ethiopia broke ranks with the African Union and voted on the merits of the issue.

On the agricultural front, Ziv noted that Ethiopia and Israel have a great deal to share.

Israel has a history of resolving water and land shortages and can help developing countries transform current traditional subsistence farming methods to more sophisticated production techniques. But the foreign ministry's budget for MASHAV, an official overseas development program that focuses on sharing Israel's technological and agricultural experience with the developing world, has recently been halved, Ziv said.

The Foreign Ministry is hoping that the recent implementation of an investment agreement between Ethiopia and Israel will encourage the private sector to step in and compete in areas such as water management and agricultural development.

Ziv said African leaders have recently shown interest in developing self-sufficient economies and Israel has experience in that area.

Plight of Falash Mora shows divide

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — It's difficult to pinpoint exactly when the Israeli involvement in the plight of the Falash Mora in Ethiopia began, and it's hard to predict how it will end.

Some trace the problem to the airlift of 15,000 Ethiopians in 1991, when members of the Falash Mora community were whisked into Israel alongside their Jewish neighbours, the Beta Israel.

Others blame the American Jewish organizations who promised the Falash Mora homes in Israel and encouraged them to congregate in refugee camps to facilitate their emigration.

In either case, humanitarian organizations now claim that the Falash Mora, who moved away from their traditional villages and support networks into two camps in Addis Ababa and Gondar, are facing impossible living conditions. Activists are calling on the Israeli government to bring all 23,000 of them to Israel immediately.

As Ethiopian descendants of Jews who converted to Christianity, the Falash Mora mostly lived in villages isolated from both the Beta Israel and Christian communities. Now, many are hoping to reunite with family members already living in Israel.

In February 2003, an Israeli interministerial committee voted to bring in the Falash Mora. Since then, 200 to 300 immigrants have arrived monthly. At that rate, it could take – at the very least – close to 10 years to transport the entire group.

Steven Kaplan, a professor of African studies at Hebrew University, said the problem with a slow immigration is that the process many be endless.

"So far, no matter how many are brought in, the remaining population doesn't change," he said.

"Enormously complex family structures where households aren't always made up of biological children contribute to a never-ending community."

Lobby groups in Israel and America, who have been unrelenting in keeping the issue alive over the years, argue that discrimination is the primary reason behind the prolonged process.

Yet the Israeli government has continuously passed legislation in favour of the Falash Mora, and most political parties, including the right-wing and religious parties, support their immigration.

The only party opposed to the immigration is Shinui, which questions the feasibility of bringing 20,000 immigrants to Israel when the country is so financially pressed by the security needs caused by the intifadah.

The Ethiopian community itself is split on the issue. While some, such as the Southern Wing to Zion group, are working to bring the Falash Mora to Israel, others believe the Falash Mora should be helped to resettle back in their original communities in Ethiopia.

Danny Adino Ababa, a reporter for Yediot Achronot, immigrated to Israel from Ethiopia in 1984.

A recent demonstration in Israel urging the government to do more for the Falash Mora. [Isranet photo]

"It is a tragic story," Ababa was quoted recently as saying in the newspaper. "We [the Beta Israel] remained Jewish and they converted [to Christianity]," he said, adding that the government of Israel is humiliating the Beta Israel by bringing in the Falash Mora.

Ababa also said that bringing the Falash Mora to Israel will only make the integration of the existing Ethiopian community in Israel that much harder.

Current statistics indicate that if another 20,000 are brought to Israel, they will make up a third of the total number of Ethiopian immigrants.

Many Falash Mora will have to undergo a conversion process when they arrive. However, once they become citizens of the State of Israel, there will be no distinction made between them and other Ethiopian Jews, said Batia Eyob, executive director of the Israel Association of Ethiopian Jews (IAEJ).

Sharon defiant

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said last week he will not resign over a corruption scandal rocking Israeli politics. "I have no intention of resigning and am confident of my ability to complete my current term," Sharon told Yediot Achronot in one of several media interviews. Businessman David Appel was indicted last week for trying to bribe Sharon in the late 1990s when Sharon was foreign minister. If Sharon is believed to have offered favours in return, he could be charged within weeks.

Bulge in Wall repaired

Jordanian experts have fixed a bulge in a retaining wall of Jerusalem's Temple Mount. Israel said the bulge was caused by renovation work conducted by the Waqf, the Islamic trust that oversees the compound. Israeli experts said the bulge could have caused the Wall to collapse, but the Jordanians denied the defect was that serious.

Fence moveable: Shalom

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said the Palestinians should return to the negotiating table because Israel is ready to make changes in the controversial barrier being built in the West Bank to prevent terror attacks. "The fence is moveable," he said. In an interview with the Associated Press at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, Shalom said Israel has pulled back similar fences on the borders with Egypt, Jordan and Lebanon and could do so again.

Minister to Pakistan?

An Israeli cabinet minister said he is planning a landmark trip to Pakistan. Agriculture Minister Yisrael Katz told Israel Radio that he has received an invitation to visit Pakistan in March, which would be a breakthrough given the Islamic state's long-standing hostility to Israel. A spokesperson in Pakistan's Foreign Ministry in Islamabad denied that Katz received a formal invitation, saying he may be part of a UN agricultural delegation scheduled to visit Pakistan.

Hezbollah kills soldier

An Israeli soldier was killed last week along the Israel-Lebanon border. Jan Ruchansky was killed last Monday by a Hezbollah anti-tank missile fired at an Israeli bulldozer that was defusing mines.

Gaza boy killed

Soldiers killed a 12-year-old Palestinian suspected of trying to infiltrate Israel from the Gaza Strip. Two other boys were wounded in the incident, which took place after the army spotted a group of seven Palestinians approaching the Gaza Strip boundary fence with a ladder. There are frequent infiltration attempts at the site of the shooting, and sometimes terrorists send boys as scouts to test the response time of the Israel Defence Forces.

Saudi peace plan calls on Arab states to absorb refugees

By YOAV STERN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — According to a new plan being prepared by Arab states, Israel will negotiate a peace agreement with all the Arab states, not just the Palestinians, and they would absorb Palestinian refugees.

The Kuwaiti newspaper Al Siyasa reported Saturday that the initiative, led by Saudi Arabia, would include "declarations of peace agreements between all Arab states," which will bring an end to the conflict between Israel and the Arabs. The states would normalize their ties with Israel, including the appointment of ambassadors.

The Arab states will demand that Israel withdraw to its borders prior to the June 1967 war – in other words, to leave the West Bank and Gaza and withdraw from the Golan Heights.

The initiative also includes a "creative solution" for the problem of Palestinian refugees, a key issue in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

According to the plan, some two million Palestinian refugees would be allowed to return to the new Palestinian state that would be established. More than two million others would be absorbed by other Arab states and compensated for their suffering.

Arab countries would open their gates to the refugees on the condition their number doesn't exceed 10 per cent of their existing population.

Under the deal, Iraq will also accept Palestinian refugees. Israel will not be required to absorb any Palestinian refugees.

The new Arab initiative, led by Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah, was presented last week to the U.S. State Department. It would be brought for approval at a summit of Arab League leaders to be held in Tunisia in March.

Egypt, Jordan, Morocco and probably Qatar are the main supporters of the plan. The plan is based on a prior peace initiative presented by Saudi Arabia, and approved in a summit held in Lebanon in 2002. According to the previous Saudi plan, Arab states would recognize Israel's right to exist in peace, and will hold ties with it if it withdraws to the pre-1967 war lines.

On Monday, Palestinian lawmakers expressed opposition to the section of the plan that calls for more than 2 million Palestinian refugees to be absorbed by other Arab states.

Hatam Abdel Khader, a member of the Palestinian Legislative Council, was quoted as saying that while logic dictates that Israel would not allow 5 million Palestinians into its territory, the Palestinians are not willing to give up their "right of return." He said any proposed change to this demand would have to be approved by Palestinian institutions.

Abdel Khader also said Palestinians won't agree to any change regarding their "right of return" unless it is based on United Nations resolution 194, which holds that refugees should be permitted to return to their homes "at the earliest practicable date."

We invite our readers to submit any of their works of unpublished, original fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. The fiction should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions

If you want us to return the submissions, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so. The editor.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our tenth annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2004 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, February 13, 2004. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 27, 2004.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 4, 2004. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Hamas proposes 10-year truce for Israeli pullback

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A top Hamas official has said his organization could declare a 10-year truce with Israel if Israel withdraws from territory captured in the 1967 Six-Day War.

Abdel Aziz Rantisi told Reuters late Sunday Hamas had come to the conclusion that it was "difficult to liberate all our land at this stage, so we accept a phased liberation.

"We accept a state in the West Bank, including Jerusalem, and the Gaza Strip. We propose a 10-year truce in return for [Israeli] withdrawal and the establishment of a state," he said in a telephone interview from hiding in the Gaza Strip. His comments appeared to strengthen signs of a big political shift by a faction sworn to destroy Israel.

Israel dismisses any talk of Hamas moderation as a smokescreen for military preparations by a group at the forefront of suicide bombings that have killed hundreds of Israelis during more than three years of violence.

Indeed, Rantisi told Reuters late Sunday any such new proposal would not mean that Hamas recognized Israel or spell the end of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The terrorist group has rejected peace talks and demanded that a Palestinian state be formed on all the land that was Palestine under the British mandate preceding the creation of Israel more than five decades ago.

Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin said recently the group could accept a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, but he gave no indication how long that might ensure peace.

Rantisi said the truce could last 10 years, though "not more than 10 years."

Discussion within Hamas on accepting a state in just the West Bank and Gaza Strip was not new, he said, but the fact that "the movement has taken a decision on this" was new.

Rantisi said he did not expect Israel to respond favourably to the new suggestion, "when it has rejected the Palestinian Authority's offer for less land than what we are proposing."

Germany offers special compensation to victims of Nazi medical experiments

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — The German government has agreed to compensate for Nazi concentration camp survivors who were subjected to medical experiments during the Holocaust.

An official announcement of the new compensation program, to be administered by the New York-based Claims Conference, is expected to be released in the coming days.

A symbolic, one-time compensation of about $5,400 (US) will be paid to each of the 1,778 survivors of the medical experiments, who were held in special blocks of the concentration camps set aside for this purpose. Most of them are now in their 80s or older. Another 119 people whose family members died as a result of these experiments are also slated to receive this special compensation.

There are 389 survivors of the Nazi medical experiments now living in Israel. The remaining survivors (or their heirs) are scattered in 33 other countries.

The proposal for this special program for the victims of Nazi medical experiments was first made by the Claims Conference in discussions with the German government that resulted in a program for former slave and forced laborers, a global compensation agreement signed in 2000.

In recent years, the Claims Conference has administered the distribution of payments to Holocaust victims from several humanitarian funds. Some of the money for these funds came from the dormant accounts of Holocaust victims at Swiss banks.

The executive vice-president of the Claims Conference, Gideon Taylor, told Ha'aretz that a major effort was made to locate the surviving victims of Nazi-era medical experiments. Now that this effort has been concluded, he explained, the Claims Conference will begin distributing the compensation payments.

Part of this effort also included collecting testimonies from the survivors, and their stories will now be officially published. Some of the documentation will be stored at the New York offices of the Claims Conference, and some will be transferred to Yad Vashem, the Holocaust museum in Jerusalem.

"Until now, there was little historic research focusing on the victims of medical experiments," Taylor said. "The information we found will make a huge contribution to investigating some of the most horrendous events in world history."

Canada's Premier Golf Camp

Par Golf Camps is now entering its 12th fabulous summer as Canada's premier golf instruction organization.

Instruction is provided for beginners, intermediate and advanced golfers all under the auspices of Joshua Cooper, golf professional and coach of the Maccabi Youth Golf Team. Campers are picked up at home and brought to the campsite, an 18 hole golf course with a driving range, short game area and indoor facilities. Therefore, there is no busing throughout the day as all activities are held at the same location.

Children are placed in select groups based on their age and ability. The daily routine focuses on different aspects of golf. Campers play nine holes twice a week throughout their two week session. One month and leadership training programs are also available.

In addition to junior camps, Par Golf hosts adult golf camps. One, two and three day golf camps are held throughout the golf season. On course instruction is a primary focus at all two and three day adult camps. Golfers learn in actual playing scenarios instead of just on a driving range.

Par Golf Camps is offering weekend junior programs beginning in May. Call us for more information.

For more information on any of our programs, please visit our website at www.learngolf.com or call us at telephone (416) 960-GOLF (4653).

BSS this summer

This summer, Bishop Strachan campus in Forest Hill will hum with activities for serious artists and students 7 to 17. Whether your child attends the Erin Gilmour Arts Workshops or the Summer Academy, the atmosphere will be lively, the learning experience unparalled. After your child taps his or her creativity here, summer will never be the same.

The Erin Gilmour Arts Workshops connect new and established working artists, with young people who are passionate about the arts. The roster includes acting, photography, film, dance, visual art, performance, strings amd choral music; and two workshops offer high school credits. Also, there's a March break workshop called Shakespeare for Kidz.

BSS constantly seeks new programs and artists to enhance young artists' understanding and technique, with approaches from traditional to avant garde. These one- to four-week workshops are hands-on, with low student to teacher ratios. Enabling young people to immerse themselves in art, they address every child's unique interests and experience.

In addition, from June 28 to July 23, BSS offers many Grade 9-12 credit courses at its co-educational Summer Academy. Small classes and skilled teachers give the quality education only BSS can. Scholarships are available.

URJ Camp George: Reaching New Heights

As the Union for Reform Judaism's first Canadian camp, Camp George opened its doors in 1999 and has acquired a wonderful reputation after only five seasons. Located in a magnificently wooded lakefront setting 2¼ hours north of Toronto, the camp program is designed to enhance the physical, social, and personal skills of youngsters completing grades 3-9 in a warm, nurturing, and friendly Jewish environment. The camp's athletic activities include tennis, soccer, basketball, softball, beach volleyball, street hockey, and ultimate frisbee. In addition, Camp George also has a full mountain biking program and a state-of-the-art ropes challenge course (which includes both high and low elements, two climbing walls, and a giant swing). Water sports include waterskiing, sailing, canoeing, and kayaking, and all campers participate in a Canadian Red Cross swim program. The camp's tripping program consists of overnight adventures, day hikes in Algonquin Park, bike trips and 3-4 day canoe and hiking trips.

The camp's arts program is just as diverse. Activities include drama, arts and crafts, pottery, photography, Israeli Folk Dancing, and modern dance. The arts are integrated into much of the regular camp program and are included in a variety of special programs, including a 2-day Maccabiah event, Tikkun Olam projects, day trips out of camp, and Yom Yisrael.

"...What do I love most about camp? It's not one thing really. It's not the ropes course, or the climbing wall, or swimming, or waterskiing, or the camping trips, or the sports. It's all of these things... It's being part of a community where all of these activities are available every day."

- Camp George Camper

"The conversations I have with camp friends are different than the conversations I have with my school friends... I always knew it was important to be Jewish – but it was because my parents always said so. Only at camp did I begin to discover why it is important for me."

- Camp George Staff Member

"At Camp George, I learned how to manage my time, how to delegate authority, and how to rely on others... In confronting the wide range of camp experiences, I gained valuable tools for tackling a wide range of life experiences."

- Camp George Alumnus

"My daughter just completed her fourth season at Camp George. I continue to be inspired by the level of professionalism and commitment of your staff. Her stories reflect a most enjoyable time with her friends and the incredible staff, meaningful activities, the learning and development of many skills, and an awareness and appreciation of her heritage in ways she may not receive in other areas of her life..."

- Camp George Parent

"From my perspective, the best part of my granddaughter's Camp George experience is the continuation and nourishment of her connection with Judaism and a feeling that she has a home in the Jewish community."

- Camp George Grandparent

Camp George is OCA accredited. The season consists of two 3½ week sessions, with a special 12-day option for August session Grade 3 campers. Select spaces are still available for the 2004 season. Another exciting year at Camp B'nai Brith Ottawa

Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is a privately owned overnight camp located in the foothills of the Gatineaus, 45 minutes outside of Ottawa. We have a long and successful camping history of well over 60 years. Our camp prides itself in welcoming children from all over the world. Although we are a private Ottawa camp we treasure our many campers from Montreal, Toronto, New York, Florida, Israel and even the Caribbean.

Camp B'nai Brith has a varied program to stimulate children with many different interests. We offer an extensive number of different programs such as drama, arts & crafts, dance, tennis, basketball, miniature golf, all camp programs (Grey Cup/Super Bowl, World Cup, Colour War, etc.) and tremendous camp spirit. Our waterfront overlooking the Ottawa River has a sandy beach which is home to our vast watersports. They include waterskiing, windsurfing, knee-boarding, kayaking, canoeing, sailing and a Catamaran. Our Olympic size pool allows campers to enjoy swimming away from the hub of activities at the beach. Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is very proud of our extremely successful Red Cross aquaquest program which offers all levels of instruction up to and including Bronze Cross.

Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa offers a kosher kitchen (Ottawa VAAD Kashruth) and is also a PEANUT SENSITIVE camp. In addition, we offer a Judaica program which is fun but yet traditional. This includes weekly Shabbat services. We also have an indoor gym, dance studio,recreation hall and an on-site infirmary which has a fully qualified medical staff.

One area we are most sensitive to is the anxiety of our younger campers coming to camp for the first time. To ease this situation we have instituted 2 very successful programs. Firstly, we offer our 2 wk. starter camp for new C.B.B. campers aged 7-10. The other is our Big Brother/Big Sister program which pairs younger campers with older campers prior to and during camp to help campers feel more at ease.

If you are interested in giving your child an active, stimulating and exciting summer camp experience, then Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is the place to be. For more information please call Morley Mason at (613) 228-8495.

Nutritionist helps parents win the food fight

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Joey Shulman, a chiropractor and registered holistic nutritionist was inspired by her young patients to write her book, Winning the Food Fight.

Shulman, 31, vice-president of nutrition at Truestar Health, an integrated wellness website, said that when she was practising in Oakville, she would see a number of children with such ailments as attention deficit disorder, asthma, eczema or ear infections.

"Children with ADD would come in with Ritalin in one hand and a Big Gulpy in the other. Their parents did not see the connection.

"They were confused. They did not know how to feed their kids, and they were throwing up their hands in nutritional bewilderment."

She was motivated to write the book, she says, so that she could encourage parents to try the natural route. "I had to let them know that food can be healthy, tasty and fun at the same time.

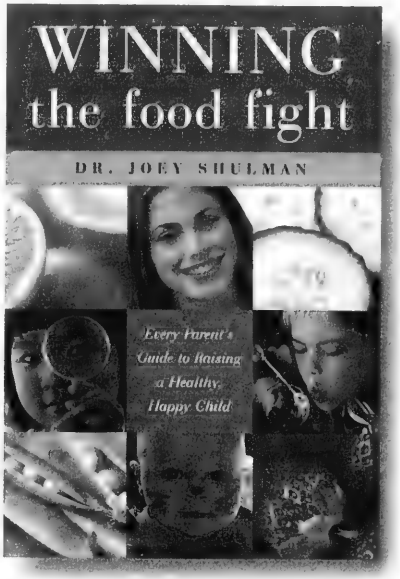
"They needed to learn how to use the grocery store as a defence against illness or disease."

Among the reasons kids are having health problems, she says, is that they are eating too many dairy foods and too much processed flour and refined sugar, and they're not getting enough essential fats such as those found in fish, walnuts and avocados.

Cow's milk has been linked to runny noses, ear infections, asthma, juvenile diabetes and stomachaches, she says.

"Children can get their calcium from a number of non-dairy sources such as almonds, soybeans, calcium-fortified orange juice, sunflower seeds, salmon or broccoli."

While restricting children from drinking sugary carbonated drinks is a step in the right direction, she says, replacing them with sugary fruit drinks is not. "Parents should be aware that certain fruit and power drinks contain just as much sugar as the pop itself, approximately 11 teaspoons of sugar! Sticking to bottles of water and 100 per cent real fruit juices is the best bet for health."



Parents hesitate to turn around children's eating habits, she says, because it is too much of a challenge. "Food is one way for children to maintain power.

"If we give our kids some choices, however, we would empower them. They're not going to starve themselves. Even if they say no the first few times, eventually, they will eat."

She's not asking parents to be inflexible. "I like to use the 80/20 rule. If children fall off the wagon 20 per cent of the time, they'll get back on."

Shulman suggests making changes in "tiny baby steps. Begin by watering down the juice, serving veggie dogs instead of hot dogs, or serving whole wheat bread. It has to be a family affair. Let the kids see that you are eating the same way."

Changing slowly is the sure recipe to success, she says. "You just have to stick to your guns. Kids don't carry nutritional baggage. If you decrease the amount of saturated fat they consume, give them lots of whole grains, greens and fresh food, they'll get used to eating that way."

Shulman recommends the following recipes:

DELICIOUS AND HEALTHY NACHOS

1 onion, diced
1 green pepper, diced
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 package veggie ground beef
1 cup salsa (mild, medium or hot)
1 bag baked nacho chips
soy or low-fat shredded cheese to taste

Sauté onion and green pepper in olive oil over medium heat for 5 minutes. Add veggie ground beef and salsa in skillet. Stir and let simmer for 5 minutes.

Spread baked nacho chips on a foil-covered cookie sheet. Spread ground beef mixture over the nachos. Sprinkle with shredded cheese. Bake at 350 for 10 minutes. Serves 2-3.

GUACAMOLE

4 avocados
5-8 tbsp. salsa (mild, medium or hot)
¼-½ tsp. cumin (spice)
½ tsp. crushed garlic
½ tsp. lemon juice

Mash up green flesh of avocado with fork until creamy. Add salsa, cumin and garlic, and mix. Add a small amount of lemon juice to prevent browning. Serves 3-4.

FLAXSEED OIL DRESSING

¾ cup flaxseed oil
¼ cup red wine vinegar
1½ tsp. Dijon mustard
½ tsp. maple syrup
½ tsp. crushed garlic
½ tsp. oregano

Mix all contents together and store in fridge. Dressing will last five to seven days. Yields 1 cup.

Singer, pianist love to perform

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

It was an ad in The Canadian Jewish News a-year-and-a-half ago that brought together musically talented singer, Bob Wise, 84, and pianist, Nathan Rosen, 60.

Wise had just moved to Toronto from Montreal, where three of his four children live. Soon after his arrival, the singer began looking for an accompanist for his performances.

The octogenarian, who retired in 1993 from the family business, a chain of 127 variety stores called Wise Department Stores, says he has loved to sing since he was a child.

"I love my audience and I perform the songs they remember," Wise says, adding his favourite song stylist is Frank Sinatra.

"They tell me that I sing like him."

When he was 19, without any formal training, he joined a singing group called Be Natural. They entertained troops in Quebec and Ontario.

His career took off after he performed as a guest on a cruise ship. His appearance was filmed and was later viewed by Montreal's Golden Age organization, who asked him if he would perform in hospitals and seniors' homes.

When he moved here, he decided to put an ad in The CJN because, he says, "I realized that I needed a project."

He says he got six replies, "but right away, it struck me that Nathan Rosen was the best accompanist I could find."

Rosen, whose family moved to Toronto from Montreal when he was 10 years old, is a well-known accompanist, composer of Jewish music, arranger, conductor and music teacher. He has accompanied, and is sought after by, many cantors in Toronto.

Rosen says he was impressed with Wise.

"Bob performed at Grossinger's with Eddie Fisher and he has made some recordings. He has a natural crooner's voice.

"Although Bob has never taken formal music lessons, he has a gift and he relates to his audiences. The great thing about him is that he has a great facility with words – and he communicates. He gets close to his audience, looks them in the eye and they respond."

Since Wise and Rosen began collaborating, the duo have performed together at hospitals, seniors' residences, including the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and at parties, functions and simchahs.

Rosen attended Northview Heights Collegiate and received a music education degree at the University of Toronto and his certification as an Associate of the Royal Conservatory of Toronto at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

The pianist was recently honoured by Adath Israel Congregation, and his composition of Sim Shalom was performed by the synagogue's choir and an orchestra directed by Boris Brott. To honour Rosen, the synagogue published a book of his liturgical music, which is available through cantor Eli Kirshblum.

For more information or to book the duo, call Rosen at 416-635-6208.

You And Your Money

Income Trusts and you

Recently, I was talking with my cousin Saul Korman at his clothing store, Korry's. As I admired his fine selection, I realized that different garments do offer different features.

The same can be said of your income investments. Some income investments look the same, but just as you need a suit to be properly fitted, you need professional advice to determine which income investment is right for you.

Many investors are interested in maximizing the income they receive from either their businesses or from current investments. One of the best ways to accomplish this income objective may be through a relatively new asset class called Income Trusts, which offer a reasonable risk/reward.

First introduced to Canadian investors in the early 1990s, Income Trusts allow operating businesses to move away from the traditional corporate structure. They are able to pay out most of their cash flow as a distribution into the hands of the investor, otherwise known as the unit holder. This method effectively eliminates double taxation, enabling investors to receive a higher payout from income that is taxed only once — in their hands.

Income Trusts are businesses that simply give most of the distributable income they generate — often 80 cents of each dollar of profit generated — to the investor.

Income Trusts increasingly attractive to 50–74 year age group

In order to do so, an Income Trust company should have certain characteristics, the least of which should be strong and growing cash flow, a mature product or service that provides a steady cash stream of income, and the ability to give tax efficient income without double taxation.

Another interesting feature of Income Trusts is their tax treatment. While business and interest income is taxed at the investor's marginal rate, capital gains and dividend income receive preferential tax treatment. One of the key features of an Income Trust is the portion of the cash flow that is tax deferred. This income is referred to as a "return of capital" and is not a return of the investor's original investment, but a transfer of beneficial tax credits from the trust itself! When the unit holder sells his or her holding, it is normally taxed at the investor's capital gains rate.

Proposed Legislation. Add to this the recent legislation introduced in Ontario this past December to address the liability issue of income trusts. According to two industry colleagues, John Priestman of Guardian Capital, who manages the Guardian Monthly High Income Fund, and Hugh McCauley of Acuity Funds Management, a lead manager of the Acuity High Income fund, some institutional investors have minor concerns that the tax treatment and flow-through nature of trusts assume that unit holders receive, with their right of income, the obligation of business liability.

Some investors have shied away from income trusts for fear of possibly being exposed to liabilities incurred by these companies. For this reason, Standard and Poor's has not included the trusts in Canada's benchmark Standard & Poor's/TSX composite index.

Under the proposed legislation, however, all investors in income trusts based in Ontario will receive limited liability. According to Oscar Belaiche of Dynamic Mutual Funds, if you purchase your income trusts inside a mutual fund, you are deemed to hold only a unit and not the actual trusts. I agree with this interpretation, and this is my preferred method for clients to hold income trusts.

Experts predict that demand for trusts could spike higher if investors no longer have to worry about the theoretical possibility of being held liable for the actions of a trust whose units they own. My opinion is that the sector has become extremely important to seniors for income, and since government bond investments in company pension plans may experience minimal return potential next year, the legislation will pass, creating a flood of demand for the strongest Income Trusts.

Different Asset Classes. Generally, Income Trusts can be divided into four main groups:

- Business
- Resource
- Utilities
- Real Estate

According to Dynamic Fund Research, the entire Income Trust industry has grown from a market capitalization of $11 Billion in the early 1990s to a current value of over $67 Billion. Over 125 income trust issues are now on the market, each offering different characteristics to suit the investor. My opinion is that regrettably, some of these businesses are best suited to a regular incorporated structure, and the investor is well advised to seek professional advice before investing in these businesses.

Demographic Shift. The need for income is supported by demographics. The 50 to 74 age group is expected to compose over 50% of Canada's population in 10 years, according to Dynamic fund research. As this group shifts its focus from strictly capital preservation to a need to grow and preserve tax efficient retirement income, the importance of Income Trusts will likely grow.

The higher after-tax yield compared to other income generating products makes Income Trusts a highly effective retirement investment for those seeking steady cash flow. Pre-tax yields often range from 7% to more than 12% for many resource trusts. These attractive yields, combined with the potential for modest appreciation of 2% to 3%, create an attractive means to offset historically low interest rates for your retirement dollars.

What to look for. Remember that income trusts are high yielding equities that own an underlying business. With your advisor's assistance, you can find specialized mutual funds that look for mature businesses that are:

- dominant in their industry;
- generate stable, mature cash flow;
- have management with a stake in the trust; and
- manage businesses with low debt or cash requirements.

So with all these characteristics, I am reminded of my trip to the clothing store. If the suit fits, wear it!

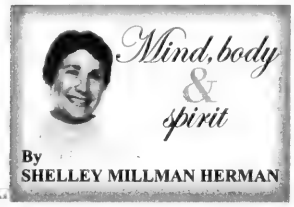
Timeless wisdom, Part 1



By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

As a health and fitness enthusiast who exercises and practises yoga most days, I have long been interested in discovering the true meaning of life, as well as the purpose of my own unique existence in this world.

Hence, I pursued an undergraduate degree in philosophy, which entailed studying many non-Jewish philosophical approaches to life, none of which gave me any real sense of meaning, or life direction.

As the years passed, I decided that, as a Jew, the time had come to study the philosophy of my own religion. I have now spent more than a decade studying Torah sources, attending (and giving some) lectures on Jewish philosophy. The more I learn, the more fascinated I become with the brilliance and incredible, timeless wisdom in Torah texts, their commentaries and other Jewish sources.

Throughout my journey of Jewish discovery, I have also continued to be health and fitness oriented, and I read numerous materials on the topic.

It occurred to me that since the Torah is supposed to embody instructions for living, on all subjects, it would be interesting to investigate Torah sources on health and wellness along with the writings of early Jewish scholars, and to explore how their teachings continue to be relevant today.

In Deuteronomy, you find the injunction to "take care of yourself, and guard your soul diligently."

Rabbi Moshe Chaim Luzzatto (also known as the Ramchal) 1707-1746, one of the greatest Kabbalists of all time, wrote: "Man's use of the world... should be motivated by the need to best maintain his health and preserve his life... Indeed, one of the commandments requires that we keep our bodies fit... so that our soul will be able to best serve God."

Exploring Torah sources on health, wellness

Rebbe Nachman of Breslov (1772-1810), who was the great grandson of the Baal Shem Tov, wrote: "What we eat and drink is a major factor in the level of happiness we experience and our ability to free ourselves of depression and anxiety."

If anyone has ever wondered whether traditional Jewish sources address the importance of maintaining our health, we see that we are, in fact, mandated to preserve our health!

Through my investigation, I discovered the teachings of, among others, the Rambam, also known as Maimonides (1135-1204), one of the most influential Jewish philosophers, and acknowledged to be one of the greatest medical authorities who ever lived.

Here is a small example of the Rambam's 800-year-old understanding of health and wellness. I will let you decide whether you think his wisdom continues to hold relevance today.

"Bodily health and well-being are part of the path to God... One must avoid anything that may harm the body, and cultivate healthful habits," says the Rambam in Mishneh Torah.

The Rambam believed "the most important task of the physician, and a greater proof of his skill, is not so much to cure the sick as it is to prevent illness in the first place." Nowadays, there is extensive literature on the importance of preventive medicine. It seems that the Rambam was the forefather of this most "current" approach to wellness!

The Rambam was also fascinated with the diversity of healing plants in nature, and his extensive medical writings include a compendium of herbal and other remedies. Interestingly, today's most popular health journals include numerous discussions on the use and benefits of herbal treatments!

The above excerpts represent only a brief glimpse of the Rambam's teachings, which include specific instructions on how and when to eat, sleep and exercise. I will introduce some of these in my future columns.

'O Canada we stand on guard for thee — with what army?'

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Canadian humour can best be characterized by self-deprecation. If This Hour Has 22 Minutes or the Royal Canadian Air Farce have taught us anything, it's that Canadians love to make fun of themselves.

And we're also unique in that being so close to the United States, we can't help but have something of an inferiority complex.

Yet, at the same time, there's nothing that makes us prouder than not being American. Notice how travelling Canadians rush to stitch the maple leaf on their backpacks.

What is the difference between Americans and Canadians? Author Allan Gould attempts to explain this in his newest book of humour Anne of Green Gables vs. G.I. Joe (Friendly fire between Canada and the U.S.) (ECW Press).

Allan Gould

Gould, born in Detroit and living in Toronto, has dual citizenship. Who better, then, to define the differences between our two nations?

His strength lies in his shorter one-liners rather than in some of his lengthier chapters.

For instance, early in the book he defines some terms that differ between Canadian and American English (besides their annoying habit of removing the letter "u" from words such as "humour" and "candour").

Canadian English:
Group of Seven: A phrase referring to a number of Canadian artists who formed a loose association in 1920 and proclaimed themselves both modern and Canadian.
American English:
Group of Seven: A global economic term referring to seven major non-Communist powers that have been meeting at formal summits since 1975. In reality the term should refer to six powers, Gould says, but out of the biblical injunction to "be kind to dumb creatures" Canada has also been included.

Canadian English:
French: One of two official languages of Canada.
American English:
French: A wine-guzzling European people of dubious moral character due to a penchant for wasting time in cafés, surrendering rather than fighting, and refusing to vote with the United States at the United Nations.

Canadian English:
Liberal: Name of the official ruling federal party in Ottawa, save for brief interregnums over the past century.
American English:
Liberal: Communist; bleeding heart; pro-abortion; anti-school prayer; do-gooder; fun hater; anti-smoking fanatic; Darwinian.

Another witty chapter is "Our Country Then and Now," in which Gould lists the differences in Canadian attitudes in the past and present.

Then:
Former prime minister Pierre Trudeau destroys the Canadian economy, alienates the West, and by invoking the War Measures Act, turns the whole nation into a banana republic – without the good weather.

Now:
Pierre Trudeau dies and is given a Churchill-like funeral; the entire country mourns for months; his son considers entering federal politics before the Canadian economy gets too strong again.

Then:
Canada lacks any kind of federally sponsored medical care, and people die like flies in their beds at home.
Now:
Canadians proudly have universal medical care and die in hospital corridors like flies, waiting for beds.

In a longer chapter that compares the American and Canadian national anthems, he breaks down the Canadian anthem line by line as if it were being studied by "half a dozen U.S. talk show hosts, some university professors of Canadian history and culture; and a number of American scholars of 19th century poetry of the new world."

Some excerpts:

The true North Strong and Free.
"What a laugh. 'Strong and Free?' With what army?"
"Free? Ever try to get away buying something up there without being hit by a provincial tax and some kind of value-added tax they have?"
From far and wide, O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
"If 'far and wide' refers to the half a million immigrants they accept every few weeks, and most of them future terrorists from what I hear, then this lyricist was certainly prescient."
"Stand on guard? I'll say it again: with what army?"

He does the same thing with the American anthem, as criticized by Liberal MP Carolyn Parrish and National Post columnist Robert Fulford. Unfortunately, it doesn't work as well.

In the chapter "Monarchism versus Republicanism," Gould compares the countries' two different political systems. Although the United States gave up the monarchy in the American Revolution, he says Americans today have a sort of "monarchism envy."

"Look at the Rockefellers, the Roosevelts. The Fords. The Kennedys. The Clintons. The Bushes. Ted Turner and Jane Fonda. Ted and Tina Turner. All royal family substitutes. Just as telling… In 2002 alone, either Princess Diana or her two sons by Prince Charles were on 73 covers (of People magazine). This was nearly half a decade after her death."

Canada, of course, has always had a monarch. "Sadly, most Canadians, if asked who is the head of state, would probably answer 'the prime minister!'… Actually, more Canadians would probably say, 'The president' and not be too far off the mark, especially after the Free Trade Agreement went through."

Of course nothing defines a nation more than its bumper stickers:
American: Bin Laden — Dead or Alive!
Canadian: Joe Clark – Is he dead or alive?

American: Buy American!
Canadian: Sell to the Americans!

And what can be more self-deprecating than the usual subject of Canadian humour: our army.

"A recent study by Jane's Defense Weekly reported that 'there is more modern weaponry in the average U.S. high school than in the entire Canadian Armed Forces.'"

And this one I thought was particularly true:

The United States on Bin Laden: The monster must be stopped.

Canada on Bin Laden: "Thank God he mentioned us, along with other countries, as a country that's worthy of being attacked."

Some of Gould's chapters on our political systems do tend to ramble on a bit – his biography of former prime minister Mackenzie King tended to be a couple pages too long (or maybe it's just my age showing – Mackenzie who?), but overall this book has quite a few laughs.

And it's informative too.

In one chapter, he describes how Canadian stores had a hard time keeping a pregnant Barbie doll (her friend Midge) in stock, while American stores pulled it off the shelves due "to a storm of complaints."

I think this alone stands as the definitive indicator of how Canadians differ than Americans.

And there was something he mentioned almost in passing that I'll hold onto forever as proof of my Canadian identity.

From now on, I will always refer to that tragic date as 11/9, not 9/11. This is, after all, how we Canadians write down dates.

Thanks for that one, Allan.

Documentary explores discord at Concordia University

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It's a day of infamy that Montreal's Concordia University may never live down.

On Sept. 9, 2002, Arab students and their sympathizers rioted, refusing to permit Benjamin Netanyahu – the former Israeli prime minister – to exercise his right to free speech at a campus forum organized by Jewish students.

In the name of security, Concordia's callow administration abruptly cancelled Netanyahu's speaking engagement, thereby caving in to undue pressure and legitimizing the brazen assault on a fundamental freedom that most Canadians hold dear, but take for granted.

The television images of that violence– students rioting and breaking glass and a fearsome phalanx of police fiercely guarding Concordia's main building in the downtown core – are still searing.

The events and repercussions of that sorrowful event, which may yet prove to be the opening shots of further campus strife across Canada over the flammable Arab-Israeli conflict, are the subject of Discordia, an aptly titled 54-minute documentary produced by Adam Symansky for the National Film Board of Canada. It is scheduled to be broadcast Wednesday, Feb. 4, on CBC Newsworld at 10 p.m.

Co-directed by Ben Addelman and Samir Mallal, this dispassionate film unfolds largely through the eyes of three campus activists: Samer Elatrash, a Palestinian whose group, Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, spearheaded the opposition to Netanyahu's appearance; Aaron Maté, the pro-Palestinian vice-president of the student council, and Noah Sarna, the co-president of Hillel, the Jewish student association that co-sponsored the ex-prime minister's visit.

To their credit, the directors practise explanatory rather than partisan journalism and thus paint a reasonably balanced picture of the discord that convulsed Concordia, whose enrollment consists, in part, of an estimated 3,000 Arab students and 800 Jewish students.

Hillel leader Noah Sarna, draped in the Israeli flag, is one of the Concordia student activists profiled in the NFB documentary Discordia.

From a personal point of view, the student activists profiled in Discordia are quite amiable. But behind their pleasant demeanours seethe the political passions that may never cool.

Elatrash, the son of Palestinians who lost their land when Israel occupied the West Bank in the 1967 Six Day War, is a dyed-in-the-wool Palestinian nationalist. Although he was born in the Toronto area, he considers himself an exile and longs for the moment when he can live in a sovereign Palestinian state.

Claiming he is not anti-Semitic, Elatrash says he has never uttered an anti-Jewish remark. His claim may be buttressed by the fact that his spunky red-haired girlfriend, Emily Bitting, and his comrade-in-arms, Maté, are Jewish.

But when it comes to Netanyahu, Elatrash has tunnel vision. In his opinion, Netanyahu has no business on campus. "We were going to shout him down," he declares, apparently oblivious to the hallowed notion that universities should be sanctuaries of civil discourse.

Maté, whose grandparents perished in Auschwitz and whose father, Gabor, is vehemently opposed to the policies of the current Israeli government, is more of a nuanced figure.

He brands Netanyahu as a "war criminal" and supports the view that he should be barred from campus. Yet he theoretically believes in the concept of free speech, at least for anyone but Netanyahu. The contradiction is glaring, and unfortunately, the filmmakers do not really address it.

Maté's conflicted feelings are also evident when he dissents from the left-leaning student council's high-handed decision to ban Hillel without due process.

Surveying the turbulence on campus, Sarna – a Jewish day school graduate who regards Israel as a powerful symbol of Jewish survival – turns Concordia's current advertising slogan on its head. "I got a real education for the real world," he observes in a bitter and ironic comment.

And in a heated verbal clash with Maté, Sarna accuses him of being a "self-hating" Jew. "It sucks to be so disliked," laments Maté, the recipient of a rash of Internet hate mail.

In a poignant moment, Sarna's mother recalls a childhood free of anti-Semitism. Yet now her son faces "new worries," she remarks, referring to the turmoil at Concordia.

It seems clear that the events at Concordia may have been the precursor of a new era of campus chaos in Canada.

Maté alludes to this sombre possibility when he observes that developments in the Middle East are spilling over into this peaceful country.

If this proves to be the case, Discordia many open many eyes.

Tourism Upswing in Israel: Tourism to Israel had another extraordinary month in November 2003, with a 46 per cent increase in visitors over November 2002.

"The dramatic increase mirrored an identical 46 per cent increase in October," said Rami Levi, Israel's tourism ambassador North and South America.

Levi and other tourism experts expected December to be a high tourism month as well. When the numbers are tallied, they expect them to show that more than 1.1 million tourists visited Israel in 2003.

Figures released by the Israeli Government Tourist Office in Toronto indicate that the number of Canadians visiting Israel also jumped 22 per cent between January and November 2003. Israel welcomed nearly 26,400 Canadians during that period, compared to 21,600 the year before.

"We're witnessing an exciting tourism turnaround," said Dani Shahal, Israel's consul for tourism to Canada.

According to Israeli Tourism Minister Benny Elon, every 100,000 tourists bring the equivalent of $2.7 million to Israel and provides 4,000 jobs. For travel information on Israel, visit www.goisrael.com or call 1-888-77-ISRAEL.

Wireless Internet At Inbal: The Inbal Jerusalem Hotel (www.inbal-hotel.co.il) has introduced wireless Internet access in its expansive lobby, which ensures high-speed communications from any laptop computer. (If needed, visitors can obtain modem cards from the front desk.)

The new "wi-fi" connection is one of a series of upgrades under way at the popular five-star hotel (formerly the Laromme). Recently, the hotel received the prestigious Readers' Choice award from Condé Nast Traveler magazine as one of the top five Middle Eastern hotels. In its end-of-2003 world review of hotels, Condé Nast readers gave the Inbal Jerusalem 77.7 points, the highest ranking of any Israeli hotel. (The King David Hotel in Jerusalem received 69.9 points and the American Colony 69.6 points.)

Situated in the heart of Jerusalem, the 294-room Inbal overlooks the Liberty Bell Park and the Old City. It is within short walking distance of many of Jerusalem's historic and religious sites as well as the city's cultural and entertainment centres.

Friedmans captured again on home video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Capturing The Friedmans has just been released on video. This is probably one of the most harrowing documentary films I have ever seen. It is also one of the best.

It tells the true story of Arnold Friedman, an admitted pedophile who, along with his 18-year old son, Jesse, was arrested in 1987. They were both charged and convicted of sexually abusing young boys.

What makes this such a fascinating and disturbing film are the doubts raised by the film as to the guilt or innocence of the Friedmans and its depiction of the destruction of the family in the wake of the scandal surrounding the police investigation.

From the outside, the Friedmans appeared to be a perfectly normal suburban family. Arnold was a school teacher who taught computers after school and on weekends at his home. He was an excellent musician and had worked professionally as a band leader in the Catskills after he completed his university education.

But there was something different about this family.

Arnold was later to admit that he had had sexual contact with two young boys before he moved to Long Island. Then, when Arnold ordered a porn magazine from the Netherlands, American postal officials intercepted the publication and began investigating Arnold's sexual interests.

Filmmaker Andrew Jarecki originally decided to do a film about David Friedman, who was a successful party clown in the New York area, entertaining hundreds of ordinary kids as well as the children of the rich and famous.

When Jarecki began to look closer, he discovered that David Friedman was the oldest son of Arnold Friedman and brother of Jesse Friedman, both of whom had been convicted and sentenced to prison for sexual assault.

Suddenly the film changed its focus. Jarecki got David and his mother to sit for on-camera interviews. He also interviewed many of the police officials, judges and lawyers who had been involved in the case.

Jarecki found that he had stumbled across a much bigger story than he had anticipated.

Arnold was a passionate amateur photographer. He chronicled his wholè family's life on film or video. Everything the family did found its way onto a permanent record, including the entire family's reactions to the charges laid against him and Jesse. Much of this material has been incorporated into Jarecki's film. We become witnesses to the stress and anxiety the family members experience, and we see the complete collapse of the family unit.

The way the film is constructed, with new facts introduced to stir things up whenever you think you understand what has happened, it keeps you on edge and guessing until the end of the film. You never know for certain whether Arnold and Jesse actually did what they were accused of doing.

Capturing The Friedmans is not an easy film to watch, and it gives you a lot to think about. And some of the images remain with you for quite a while. What more can you ask from a film?

And now you can rent or purchase your own copy of the film and decide for yourself whether Arnold and Jesse are guilty or not.

Infected Mushroom causes trance

By RICHARD ROSENBAUM
Special to The CJN

On the night of Jan. 17, the Israeli trance music group Infected Mushroom took the stage at the Koolhaus in Toronto to provide a revved-up crowd with a raw, intense electronic experience. More accurately, it was the morning of Jan. 18, since the duo didn't appear until after 2 a.m.

Trance, for those who may not know, is a variety of electronic dance music characterized by repetitive beats and hypnotic rhythms.

Infected Mushroom is recognized worldwide as one of the leaders of the genre. In fact, however, they often seem to transcend the genre – even some people who hate most trance music still love Infected Mushroom.

For four hours before the duo began their performance, the audience enjoyed the trance spinning of DJs Deko-ze & Addy, and Gabriel & Dresden. But the crowd's reaction at the arrival of Infected Mushroom – Erez Aizen and Amit Duvdevani – showed who we were all really there to see.

The group tours extensively, but although they have been here four times, I have missed them until now. Ironically, I was in Israel the last time, and I was particularly excited to attend the show this time.

When they began their set, Aizen and Duvdevani were greeted by fans in the front rows waving Israeli flags. Huge grins broke out on their faces at seeing this, and they launched into a powerful set that lasted just over an hour and a half.

They played songs from their albums and did flawless improvisations on keyboard and digital sampler as they mixed one track into the next.

Highlights included the songs Deeply Disturbed from their most recent release, the double-disc Converting Vegetarians, and impressive show closer Bust A Move from their 2000 album Classical Mushroom.

The genius of Infected Mushroom lies in their flawless use of the one thing that so much trance music, almost by definition, tends to dispense with – melody. They're not afraid to incorporate any sound that might work: guitars, piano, banjo, carnival music, as well as every variety of beep and blip.

At this time, with calls for boycotts of all things Israeli, it's heartening to see the total acceptance on the trance scene of a group who have won the fans' devotion by the sheer force of their creativity and innovation. There were no politics that night. There was only the music.

Maccabi official a fixture on basketball scene

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the world of sports, Bernie Offstein was known for his love of basketball, his devotion to Maccabi Canada and the State of Israel, his mentoring of young athletes and his no-nonsense, can-do attitude. Offstein, vice-president of Maccabi Canada and a security consultant for the Toronto Raptors, died last week after a brief illness. He was 64.

Hundreds of members of the sports community joined family and friends for a service at Steeles Memorial Chapel that overflowed the limited seating. The large turnout was a testament to the affection and respect he commanded, and as his longtime friend Mike Katz noted, Offstein was a larger-than-life character who exhibited boundless energy and helped countless young athletes.

"He gave to the community and never had his hand out for anything," Katz said.

Offstein was a very sociable individual with numerous contacts in the sporting world. He used those contacts to help others reach their fullest potential, he said.

Katz, who delivered one of two eulogies for Offstein, said his friend "lived the fullest 64 years of anybody imaginable."

"Bernie was a devout fan of all sports but his first love was basketball, and it was through his involvement with that game that allowed him to help and touch the lives of so many people.

"When he showed up at a game, his presence validated the event. Everybody involved from players to coaches to referees to fans [was] suddenly important. I don't know why. He just had that effect."

Katz, who coaches the Humber College Hawks men's basketball team and is an assistant coach with the Canadian national team, said Offstein was a private person, but was "unfailingly blunt and direct" when discussing public issues.

A man who was true to his humble roots in midtown Toronto, Offstein was familiar with all the local gyms and fields where youngsters practise their sports. His humble origins, Katz said, served as the basis for the "nurturing and caring role he provided for the many young athletes he befriended and helped over the past 40 years. He had an eye for talent and could spot a diamond in the rough. He was not often wrong."

Bernie Offstein

Allen Gerskup, chair of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee, remembered Offstein as a tremendous supporter of Israel. Between them, Gerskup and Offstein made more than 50 trips to the Jewish state, but they never visited the ancient Dead Sea fortress of Masada. Instead, Offstein shlepped him to countless gyms across the country to watch youngsters play basketball. Perhaps if Masada had a basketball court, the two would have made it to the site, he quipped.

Sadly, Gerskup added, their plan to visit Masada in May won't take place.

Although Offstein was never a Maccabi athlete, he has been connected with the movement since the late 1970s, Gerskup said. His first role was to help arrange tryouts for the softball team, which was making its Maccabiah Games debut in 1981.

Although he held a volunteer position, Offstein spent lots of his own money on Maccabi business. During the 1986 youth games that were held in Toronto, Offstein treated the entire Israeli contingent to dinner, Gerskup recalled.

A fixture with Canadian teams that competed in Israel, Offstein made sure things ran smoothly.

"I travelled with the guy. What a treat. Bernie was not a grey person. He was a black-and-white person. If he believed in something, he'd fight for it. He made things happen," Gerskup said.

"He was the life of the party" who wouldn't hesitate to partake in good-natured ribbing, Gerskup added.

Tributes for Offstein poured in from the sporting world.

"He was always looking out for the betterment of our players," Canadian national team coach Jay Triano told the Toronto Star.

"If anyone needed anything, Bernie would try to help them. If there were more people like him working the sport, we'd be far better off."

Katz recounted the reaction of NBA star and Canadian national team member Steve Nash: "I'm shocked," Nash said in a message to Katz. "I will never forget his loyalty, support and friendship. He had such a big heart and was a riot to be around. I miss him already."

Raptors GM Glen Grunwald told Katz "we have lost a good man."

Offstein, a member of the boards of the Ontario Basketball and Canada Basketball, also served as a security consultant to the Raptors. For two seasons, he travelled with the Raptors, tending to their security needs. Last summer, he flew to Puerto Rico at his own expense to provide security for Nash during an Olympic qualifying tournament.

Offstein worked as a criminal intelligence officer with Revenue Canada for more than 45 years. Although he had no formal training in accounting or security, he was street smart and he knew a lot about people, Gerskup said.

"He was a diamond, but rough around the edges. He got things done."

"For him to be my friend was something special."

Offstein is survived by his wife, Sheila, his brother Gord, in-laws David and Huguette Jacobson and Milt and Arlene Barsky, and nieces and nephews Karen, Simone, Rivah, Melanie, Mike and Etienne.

FLIP OVER FOR ANSWERS TO CROSSWORD.

Rocky the Roadrunner – a fledgling franchise's most identifiable character

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

The most recognizable character on any first-year expansion franchise is quite often the mascot, so it's no surprise that many fans identify with Rocky the Roadrunner more than with the players skating for Toronto's new American Hockey League club.

He's certainly gotten plenty of exposure in the past several months, appearing on stage with Mayor David Miller in Citytv's New Year's Eve countdown at Nathan Phillips Square and in front of 500,000 people at last summer's SARS benefit concert.

Rocky is also hoping to get air time when Conan O'Brien brings his late night television talk show to town next month for a series of tapings at the Elgin Theatre.

For Allen Bargman, the man who plays Rocky, it's all about creating an identity for the new team in town.

"It's like a little baby," he said of his association with the Roadrunners, the Edmonton Oilers' top minor league affiliate. "It's a new experience with a new team in a new building. It's very exciting."

While he's old for a mascot at 41, Bargman says the job keeps him young and it "sure beats working for a living."

After selling real estate and then running his own decorating business, he entered the sports entertainment business eight years ago in the Toronto Raptors' inaugural season as part of their "sports magic team." The crew performed on-court entertainment during time-outs and backed up the Raptor mascot during dances and skits.

Bargman enjoyed seeing what the mascot did and went about putting together an audition tape that he sent out to every National Hockey League team.

He hooked up with the Tampa Bay Lightning and was their mascot for the 1996-97 season. From there, he turned to the diamond and landed with the St. Louis Cardinals for a year.

After spending half a season with the Jupiter (Fla.) Hammerheads minor league baseball team, Bargman returned home to Toronto to care for his father who had suffered a stroke.

When the Blue Jays held mascot auditions, he tried out, but came second. Bargman then spent three seasons with the Toronto Lynx soccer club before becoming Rocky, the best job he says he's ever had.

"I love to entertain, but it's a lot easier to do it with a head on," said Bargman, who years ago dabbled in amateur stand-up comedy at Yuk Yuks.

"I'm able to do things in costume that I would never do out of it. It affords you anonymity where nobody knows who you are, and if you look goofy, that's okay because you're supposed to."

And while the costume offers its benefits, he says there are some drawbacks as well.

On a typical game night, Bargman will lose six pounds and sometimes gets a sore back from lugging around the costume's heavy gear.

He hopes to stick around for another couple of years – as long as his body holds out, he says.

Bargman is out in the community almost daily these days drumming up support for the Roadrunners as they begin the second half of their debut season, and Rocky is scheduled to make a round of school appearances starting at the end of the month, with three to five visits per week.

Miami Beach versus Jerusalem

I have an idea, which I offer to anyone who wants to run with it: an Israel-Diaspora Real Estate Program (IDREP).

The IDREP would be designed to facilitate and encourage Diaspora Jewry to buy property in Israel.

Israel's economy is recovering modestly after three years in the doldrums. This is potentially good news. However, it is clear that investment of foreign currency is needed to ensure healthy economic growth. Tourism to Israel is one way of bringing foreign currency into the country. Another way is by buying a second home in any of the beautiful urban or rural sites across the Land of Israel.

Here's how IDREP could work. A Diaspora real estate company would partner with an Israeli real estate company to form IDREP. They would share online access to Israel's equivalent of MLS (private and commercial listings). If a Jew in Toronto wanted to buy a property in Tel Aviv, for example, he would visit the Toronto company, peruse the database of Israeli properties and earmark the ones he is interested in.

He would then travel to Israel on a real estate mission co-ordinated by the real estate companies. There, he would see his earmarked properties, attend workshops on the laws of property acquisition, taxes etc., and meet homeowners.

The partnership between the Diaspora and the Israeli real estate companies would have built-in checks and balances to protect all parties. Commissions could be split between the two companies or their agents, with an option of placing some of the funds in a foundation that would encourage and/or subsidize real estate investment in Israel.

IDREP could also offer time-sharing properties. You could then visit Israel, either through direct payment or by swapping your home with an Israeli interested in visiting the Diaspora.

According to Dubi Weiss, sales manager for the Moriah Plaza Club, time-share customers save up to 50 per cent off a regular vacation would cost in a five-star hotel.

Diaspora Jews have spent millions of dollars on condominiums in Miami and other southern locales. South Florida has one of the largest concentrations of Jews outside of Israel, when you include the annual migration of snowbirds.

According to online economic sources, it is estimated that Jewish investment in Israel, however, is about one-sixth of what it could be. It appears that most Diaspora Jews have not included Israel in their investment portfolios, but have instead left the risks up to Israelis.

Donating to Israel has given Diaspora Jewry the chance to invest in the development of our homeland, secure the existence of the Jewish people and take care of the weakest among us. Giving tzedakah to Israel must continue, as it is a divine venture, with God as the broker.

It is important however, that we increase our level of financial investment in Israel so that Jews in the Diaspora and in Israel have a more mature and equal relationship, which is not inherent to the giving of tzedakah.

IDREP would bolster the personal incomes of our Israeli brothers and sisters working in the real estate market, bring much-needed foreign currency into the country and fulfil the Jewish imperative of living in Israel and experiencing one's Jewishness in a time and space imbued with history and holiness.

Being a condo owner in Miami is nice. Being a homeowner in Israel, however, is Jewish. IDREP is yours if you want it.

"The hope of 2,000 years. To be a free people in our own land… In the land of Zion and Jerusalem." – Hatikvah

Apples, Baked in Phyllo for Tu B'Shevat

6 apples, cored
1/2 cup raisins
1 tsp. cinnamon white sugar
1/2 cup chopped almonds phyllo dough
margarine

Core the apples, with a wide hole and chop the apple that you remove, along with an additional chopped apple, if desired. Chop the almonds, mix with sugar, cinnamon, raisins and apple and add a bit of wine if the mixture is dry. Stuff this into the apple.

Cut 1 sheet phyllo dough into quarters. Place an apple in the centre of one quarter and fold the dough up around it. Brush dough either with beaten egg or melted margarine. Bake at 350°F until golden brown, about 45 minutes. Serves 6.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I got married a few years ago, and along with my husband, I inherited a fairly large extended family.

Everyone is very sweet and considerate. They always have a gift for us, whether it's a birthday, an anniversary, a holiday or a hostess gift.

I don't want to sound ungrateful, because I am not. I appreciate their thoughts and kindness, but frankly I have no use for most of the things they give me. My girlfriend told me I should start regifting, which would save a lot of money and time shopping.

I actually like the idea but somehow feel very guilty at the thought of giving away one of their gifts. My cupboards are filling up quickly. What do you think?

Recycle Reuse Regift
Dear Recycle Reuse Regift,

Many people have mixed feeling about regifting. After all, someone who cares about you put thought into buying this gift.

There are two areas to consider: first, the fact that you are giving away a gift that was meant for you, and second, that you are giving a gift to someone without having bought it yourself.

Let's work on the first part. When you receive a gift, all that is required of you is to be grateful. The gift is now yours to do with as you please. It may mean using it, returning it, donating it, selling it on eBay, or in a garage sale or yes… regifting it.

Now for the second part. Regifting does not mean that you are not putting time and thought into your gift. It simply means you are turning to your own cupboards instead of the shopping mall.

Not to worry. With a little direction and practice you too can be a regifting pro. First, you must have an excellent memory, or label where your gift came from. Never regift within the same social circle. Never regift something that you have used even once. Remove all existing cards and wrapping. Don't regift for the sake of getting rid of something. If the gift does not fit the recipient, buy something. Above all, give from your heart. It doesn't matter where the gift comes from.

On the same day

Last week, a Palestinian police officer from Bethlehem took a seat at the back of the number 19 bus in Jerusalem and detonated a bomb killing 10 people and injuring more than 50. Later that day, Israel received the bodies of its soldiers Benny Avraham, Adi Avitan and Omar Suwad as part of a prisoner exchange with Hezbollah. As part of the exchange, Israeli businessman Elchanan Tennenbaum was liberated from captivity in Lebanon. Below is the state ceremony at Ben-Gurion Airport paying tribute to the fallen soldiers.

Yechezkel Goldberg

'That's the way Chezi was'

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Last Thursday morning, Yechezkel (Chezi) Goldberg, 41, missed his regular bus, a service he had helped arrange between his West Bank town of Betar Illit and Jerusalem. The social worker took a different route into the city to keep an appointment with a family in crisis.

The alternate route put Goldberg on the number 19 bus with Ali Jaara, a Palestinian policeman from Bethlehem who detonated himself, killing Goldberg and 10 others, and wounding 50 more. Hamas and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, an offshoot of Arafat's Fatah movement, are both claiming responsibility.

Joe's Jewish Question

ATLANTA — CNN morning anchorman Bill Hemmer called U.S. Senator Joseph Lieberman's campaign to apologize for asking him to answer a question "as a Jew" in an interview ahead of last week's Democratic presidential primary in New Hampshire, the Jerusalem Post reported. "Senator, as a Jew, do you believe the construction of the security wall in Israel is the right path to peace?" Hemmer asked Lieberman on Jan. 23. The senator called the question "inappropriate" and said he would answer it "as an American who happens to be Jewish."

MP Fired From Post

LONDON — Charles Kennedy, leader of Britain's Liberal Democratic Party, fired Jenny Tonge as party spokesperson on children's issues last month for saying she might be a suicide bomber if she were Palestinian. Speaking to a pro-Palestinian group Jan. 22 and later repeating her comments on television, Tonge said she did not condone the bombings, but added they are "truly born out of desperation" and "if I had to live in that situation… I might just consider becoming [a bomber] myself."

Poll Reveals Prejudice

ROME — Europeans maintain anti-Semitic stereotypes and anti-Israel attitudes, a new poll says. The survey, published last Monday on the eve of Holocaust Remembrance Day in Europe, found some 40 per cent of respondents believe Jews "have a special relationship with money" and more than one-third said Jews "should stop playing the victims because of the Holocaust and the persecutions of 50 years ago." Less than 60 per cent found Israel "sympathetic." The poll was conducted in nine Western European countries for the Corriere della Sera newspaper.

Trouble for Howard?

LONDON — Nearly one in five Britons would prefer that a Jew not be prime minister and one in seven think the Holocaust is exaggerated, according to a poll published last month in Britain's Jewish Chronicle. The survey of 1,007 people in England, Scotland and Wales found 18 per cent disagreed with the statement, "A British Jew would make an equally acceptable prime minister as a member of any other faith." Michael Howard, a Jew, was recently chosen to lead the opposition Conservative Party.

Security Funding Boost

PARIS — France will provide more than $18 million to increase security at Jewish institutions, Prime Minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin said at the second meeting of a new cabinet committee on anti-Semitism. According to an Israeli government survey, violent anti-Semitic attacks were down worldwide in 2003, except in France. There were 235 such attacks last year, compared with 319 in 2002. But they rose sharply in France, from 69 in 2002 to 85 in 2003.

Argentine Aliyah Down

BUENOS AIRES — The number of Argentine Jews who moved to Israel declined sharply last year. Israel released a report showing 1,400 Argentines made aliyah in 2003, a 77 per cent drop from 2002, when 6,300 Argentines moved to Israel. The decline is believed to be due to improving economic conditions in Argentina.

Palestinian Aid Opposed

NEW YORK — Some 73 per cent of Americans oppose the $200 million in annual U.S. aid to the Palestinians, versus only 15 per cent who favour it, says a new poll sponsored by the Zionist Organization of America. As well, 65 per cent said the Palestinian Authority can't be trusted to fulfil peace deals with Israel. The poll of 1,000 Americans was taken in mid-January.

AFN Rejects Ahenakew Nomination

OTTAWA — The Assembly of First Nations (AFN) has rejected former native leader David Ahenakew as a candidate for a federally-funded aboriginal committee that is to study democratic reform in the national aboriginal group.

Citing an anti-Semitic rant by Ahenakew at a native health care conference in December 2002, an AFN spokesperson said "the nomination committee could not consider him."

Ahenakew, who headed the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations (FSIN) for 10 years, faces hate crimes charges as a result of his comments, in which he called Jews a "disease" and said they deserved to be "fried" by Adolf Hitler.

Ahenakew was first recommended by his home band, the Ahtahkakoop First Nation, to the FSIN, which in turn forwarded his nomination to the AFN. FSIN chief Alphonse Bird said the organization merely passed along names recommended by local bands. Bird said, "The FSIN doesn't believe in the statements [he] made, but we also understand that he has worked all his life in the promotion of First Nations and trying to advance them, so it is a double-edged sword."

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith applauded the AFN for removing Ahenakew's name from consideration.

Kashrut agencies don't monitor cattle feed

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

But federal regulations prohibit 'feed containing material made from other ruminant animals'

Neither the Kashruth Council of Canada in Toronto nor the Vaad Ha'ir in Montreal monitor what Canadian cows are being fed, the agencies' executive directors say.

Rabbi Mordechai Levin of the Kashruth Council and Rabbi Saul Emanuel of the Vaad Ha'ir, the largest hechsher-granting bodies in Canada, said that while kosher laws dictate how an animal should be slaughtered, there are no laws concerning an animal's diet.

They were responding to inquiries about the safety of kosher meat following a CJN story last month suggesting that, while there are no guarantees, a combination of safeguards make kosher beef less likely to be infected with bovine spongiform encephalopathy (BSE). Also known as mad cow disease, it's a fatal brain-wasting illness similar to the human variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, or CJD.

In December, one Holstein cow imported into Washington state from Alberta tested positive for BSE. U.S. health officials believe the cow ate infected Canadian feed before crossing the border about two years ago. It's the first instance of mad cow in the United States and follows revelations last May of another case in Alberta.

Story update

A cow's brain, spinal cord and lower intestines are most likely to carry BSE, which is believed to be spread by infected brain parts coming into contact with an animal's beef during the slaughtering process, or by an animal eating feed that contains parts of already contaminated animals.

But while kashrut agencies don't monitor animal feed, in 1997 the Canadian Food Inspection Agency (CFIA) introduced bans that prohibit farmers from feeding cows specific foods in order to keep BSE out of the food chain.

Sergio Tolusso, CFIA's feed program coordinator, said the agency's restrictions prohibit breeders from feeding ruminant (cud-chewing) animals that are susceptible to BSE – including cattle, sheep, goats, deer, elk and bison – feed containing material made from other ruminant animals. Prohibited ingredients include meat and bones derived from ruminants.

Scientists believe the spread of BSE in cattle in the United Kingdom in the 1980s was caused by feed containing protein products made from infected cattle or sheep. Most reports of humans contracting CJD from eating diseased beef occurred there in the 1990s. So far, 139 cases have surfaced worldwide.

Proteins – organic compounds containing carbon, hydrogen, oxygen and nitrogen that are composed of one or more chains of amino acids– are important to an animal's diet, Tolusso said, because they are essential to the growth and repair of tissue.

Although plant materials are used in animal feed, protein products – including meat from non-ruminants, as well as fish, eggs and milk – are also used because they provide high-quality nutrients.

He said regulations require that all feed containing ingredients derived from ruminants must be labelled with the warning, "Do not feed to cattle, sheep, deer or other ruminants."

Producers who mix or manufacture feeds for ruminants and non-ruminants must take steps to avoid cross contamination, he said.

Last month, Tolusso told Canadian Press that an Edmonton rendering plant being investigated as the source of the feed in both Alberta mad cow cases has mislabelled animal feed in the past.

Moral clarity

From the editor's desk

British political commentator and writer William Shawcross has written a book titled Allies: The United States, Britain, Europe and the War in Iraq. The work is a defence of the American-led campaign to oust Saddam Hussein last year.

I have not read the book yet, but I hope to. For not only is the author swimming against a stormy, rising tide of anti-Bush, anti-Blair, anti-war denunciations, but he does so as a person on the left, which makes his stand ever more courageous.

As I read a review of Allies in the Globe and Mail, I was struck by the reference to Shawcross' championing of "moral clarity" in foreign affairs.

Moral clarity, it seems to me, is, alas, singularly absent in much of the individual behaviour and government and legal decisions that make the news. A cursory survey of the weekend papers yielded dozens of examples of the woeful lack of moral clarity in today's world. I cite merely three quite disparate examples.

• Canada, the Hague and Israel's fence

Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham announced this past weekend that Canada is opposed to the International Court of Justice (ICJ) sitting in judgment on the legality of Israel's security fence.

"It's better that [the security fence] remains for discussion between the parties as mandated by the Security Council," Graham said.

We join the Canada-Israel Committee in commending and applauding Graham's decision. In arriving at his conclusion, Graham is joining cause with 32 other countries who resent the brazen effort by the Palestinian Authority and its supporters to politicize the court.

To be sure, Canada does not like the fence. Most of the world does not like the fence. Even many Israelis do not like the fence. They either wish it did not exist or that it followed a different route.

But the issues surrounding the fence, they rightly argue, should not be heard by the ICJ. The consequences arising from such a precedent would be far-reaching and unfortunate for many other disputes around the world.

Thus, again, we commend Canada for adopting this morally clear line of reasoning. But where was that moral clarity last fall when Canada abstained in a vote in the General Assembly that facilitated the harmful, cynical PA manoeuvre to bring a resolution to the ICJ in the first place?

The position articulated by Graham over the weekend proves the moral opacity of our government's vote last fall.

• A cannibal in Germany

With gagging disbelief and horror, we read that a judge in Germany refused to find a self-confessed cannibal, Armin Meiwes, guilty of murder. Rather, he convicted the unrepentant man of manslaughter and sentenced him to 8½ years in jail.

"The famous 'lust for murder' was not there," the judge said. "The killing was very unpleasant for Meiwes. There were no base motives… There was an agreement between them. This was the killing of a person without murder."

Perverse and revolting.

Is eight years behind bars an adequate censure?

The convicted cannibal is already entertaining lucrative offers of reward from film companies and publishing houses.

Whose moral compass is more defective – the judge's or the cannibal's?

• The BBC and the Hutton Report

There were three immediate resignations in the BBC following the report released last week by Lord Hutton that exonerated Tony Blair's government of accusations by the network that it had "sexed up" intelligence on Saddam Hussein to drag a reluctant country to war. Hutton's condemnations of the BBC's general editorial practices and its news report by Andrew Gilligan were so strong that BBC chairman Gavyn Davies and director-general Greg Dyke apologized and resigned the same day the report was released. Gilligan, who was censured by Hutton for sloppy reporting, resigned on Friday.

As is their right, many BBC staff, through petition and peaceful protest, expressed their disappointment and even opposition to the resignations.

Gilligan, however, proved the soundness of the findings against him. In his resignation letter, he disparaged the judge – and thus, the judiciary and the judicial process.

"I accept my part in the crisis which has befallen the organization," Gilligan said. "But a great part has been played by the unbalanced judgments of Lord Hutton."

Because his behaviour was not vindicated, Gilligan attacked and, sadly, weakened one of the vital pillars on which the civility and democracy of our society rests. Where is the moral clarity?

Some readers will rightly point out that "moral clarity" is too subjective and too relativistic a concept to bemoan its lack. After all, one person's morals may be another's person's atrocity.

But I reject this argument. One has to make a stand. At some point the conscience cringes and the soul cries out. All behaviours, however justified by their supporters, are not equally valid. We must not feel defensive about the core values that we hold to be true and upon which our entire frame of human reference is based. Chief among those values, of course, is our belief in the sanctity of all life. Everything flows from this. It is the sustaining river from which all other values are tributaries. —MBD

Gibson's Passion slammed for showing Jews as Jesus' killers

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish leaders who have seen an advance screening of Mel Gibson's much-anticipated and contentious movie about the last hours in the life of Jesus have turned a decisive thumbs-down to the effort. They say it does precisely what they had feared: portray Jews as responsible for his death.

And, they add, Gibson's epic, titled The Passion of the Christ, has the potential to hobble decades worth of strides in Christian-Jewish relations.

The controversial film, the target of intense debate and concern for more than a year, opens on between 125 and 150 screens across Canada Feb. 25. It was pre-screened for about 9,000 Christian pastors and church leaders in 10 Canadian cities last month, sponsored by a coalition of evangelical Christian groups.

A Jan. 7 request by Canadian Jewish Congress (Pacific region) to the film's Canadian distributor for an advance screening before members of a Vancouver Jewish-Christian dialogue group was turned down.

A spokesperson for Equinoxe Films in Toronto informed CJC Pacific director Erwin Nest that the distributor will not be conducting advance private screenings "for any organizations," except for the media some time this month.

In Montreal, three rabbis and several Jewish members of the local Christian-Jewish dialogue were invited to view a rough cut of the movie on Jan. 13 and were told by organizers not to make any public comments about it.

That didn't prevent Rabbi Howard Joseph of Montreal's Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue from calling it "the bloodiest and most violent movie I've ever seen. I call it Lethal Weapon 5," referring to Gibson's four violent Lethal Weapon films.

"But this time," he told The CJN, "the target is centuries of historical and theological scholarship on Jesus. The other victim is the advances we've made in Christian-Jewish dialogue."

Even evangelical Christian leaders have agreed the film is terribly violent and that blood plays a large thematic role. The scourging of Jesus, in which Roman soldiers beat and whip him on his way to the crucifixion, is said to be especially gory and graphic.

Sounding a diplomatic tone, Rabbi Joseph called the film "very disappointing. It's clear that the Jews are more responsible [for Jesus' death] than anyone else."

Rabbi Allan Langner, rabbi emeritus at Montreal's Congregation Beth-El, was more forthright. He pronounced the movie "atrocious. The unmistakable message is that Jesus would not have been crucified had it not been for the bloodthirsty Jews."

He said Gibson portrays both the priests and leadership of the Jewish temple as well as the Jewish rabble in the same dark, cruel, conniving fashion.

"The only good Jews are those who follow Jesus," he said.

And Pontius Pilate, the Roman procurator who ultimately decides Jesus' fate, "is depicted almost like a saint. For the purposes of this movie, he became a tzaddik [righteous person]".

Rabbi Joseph agreed, saying Gibson's direction "exonerates Pilate, who just goes along with the Jewish leaders."

Last autumn, media reports stated the film would omit the so-called blood libel – the biblical verse from the book of Matthew in which the Jewish mob shouts: "His blood be upon us and on our children." The passage has been at the root of violent anti-Semitism for centuries.

The Associated Press reported the verse was not included in the version it saw last month, but Rabbi Langner and several U.S. Jewish leaders say the passage was in the screening they viewed.

Marsha Levy, who is active in a Montreal Christian-Jewish dialogue, says she's still upset by the movie, which "turns even Jewish children into monsters.

"The Jewish leaders are [depicted as] exceptionally negative, bloodthirsty and callous. There's also no sense of the spirituality of Jesus. Why were people following him?"

Levy also found it distressing that the Pharisees – the temple's religious leadership – were always shown "in all their finery, the best robes and jewels, while the Romans are dressed simply." She took that to mean the Jews were being depicted as more powerful than the Romans.

The film threatens advances in understanding between Jews and Christians, she feels.

"To present this as if the last 30 years have not happened is distressing. I'm sorry if Mr. Gibson feels all this rapprochement is invalid."

Rabbi Leigh Lerner of Montreal's Temple Emanuel also saw the film but was unavailable for comment. Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas was invited to the Ottawa showing but could not attend for personal reasons.

Nevertheless, Rabbi Bulka said, films like this one have the potential to rekindle "the age-old canard of Jews being Christ-killers. One of the worst things that can happen is if nothing happens, and [the message] is subtly imprinted on people's minds.

"We can handle people marching on a synagogue. What we can't handle is the psyche of someone who is adversely affected."

Reaction by U.S. Jewish leaders who have seen the film has been sharply critical.

"It makes the Romans look like lambs who are being forced" to punish Jesus, "and it shows the Jews as bloodthirsty and vengeful and unending in their desire to see him crucified," Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, told JTA after sneaking in to see the film in Orlando, Fla., by posing as the executive director of a fictitious church.

"At every single opportunity, Gibson's film reinforces the notion that the Jewish authorities and the Jewish mob are the ones ultimately responsible for the crucifixion," the ADL said in a statement.

U.S. Jewish organizations fear the film will generate ill will toward Jews, especially overseas, where anti-Semitism is on the rise.

Gibson's spokesperson, Alan Nierob, told the New York Times he wouldn't respond to the criticisms and said Gibson was still working on the film and was unavailable to comment.

Roma hate case heads to Supreme Court

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Supreme Court of Canada has granted the Crown leave to appeal a lower court decision that acquitted six white supremacists of promoting hatred against Roma (Gypsies).

As is standard practice on leave applications, no reasons were given and no date was set for a hearing of the case.

The appeal arises out of a March 2000 decision by Judge R.J. Otter of the Ontario Court of Justice, which the Crown asserts focused on a "technical" flaw in the original charges. The six accused, five males and one female, were charged with promoting hatred against Roma. At the end of the Crown's case, defence counsel argued the evidence presented to the court referred only to Gypsies, not to Roma, and therefore, the Crown did not prove its case.

Despite the Crown's request that Otter take judicial notice that Roma and Gypsies are synonymous, or that it be permitted to enter evidence to that effect, the judge ruled the Crown had not made its case. The six accused – Krystopher Krymowski, Ryan Douglas Marshall, Quinn Mason McFarlane, Michael Peter Schultz and two youths – were subsequently acquitted.

The acquittals were upheld first by a judge of the Superior Court of Justice in June 2002 and then by the Ontario Court of Appeal in May 2003.

The Appeal Court ruled there "seems to be common ground… that not all people who are referred to as gypsies are in fact Roma." What's more, the court said that since it can only decide questions of law and the definition of Roma is a matter of evidence, it would not be appropriate to rule on the trial judge's decision.

In addition, the Court of Appeal stated the trial judge's refusal to amend the charges or to allow the Crown to reopen its case were also discretionary rulings, and so it would not interfere with the trial judge's exercise of discretion.

The Crown argues it is well established that Roma and Gypsy are synonymous and that the judge could have taken judicial notice of that fact; that entering evidence to that effect at the end of its case but before the defence began to present its evidence would not have prejudiced the defence; and that the defence's conduct played a role in the Crown's failure to bring evidence equating Roma and Gypsy. The defence agreed early in the proceedings that Roma were an identifiable group. That admission would be meaningless in the context of the trial if the two groups were not identical, the Crown argued.

Bernie Farber, executive director of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, said Congress would seek leave to intervene in the case when it goes before the Supreme Court. "It is an important case for all ethnic communities that have to deal with white supremacist groups and the manner in which they attack minority communities."

Congress has developed a close relationship with the Toronto Roma community, Farber said. "The Roma were the only other ethnic group targeted by the Nazis for extinction. We have a strong relationship because we're both victims of the most brutal attack in history."

He said it the trial judge's refusal to accept that Roma and Gypsies were one and the same was puzzling, considering the Crown, defence and the judge all used the words interchangeably during the trial. The judge, Farber continued, placed too much weight on narrow technical issues and not enough weight on protecting minority communities from those who were attacking them.

Calculus of profound agony

Could there possibly have been a decision born in greater soul-searching than the one the government of Israel had to make about the redemption of its fallen soldiers – Adi Avitan, Benny Avraham and Omar Suad – and the rescue of Elchanan Tennenbaum?

Is there a right or a wrong in the calculus of such profound human agony? The arguments are compelling on both sides. Which decision affirms the sanctity of life more? Which decision most embodies the values that the Jewish state was created to uphold? Even today, a week after the exchange of nearly 500 Palestinians and others for the four Israelis, the debate still waxes as Israelis await word about the fate of Ron Arad and other Israeli MIAs.

Israelis also brace for the possibility of additional exchanges in the future. For Hezbollah and Hamas leaders now boast of the utility of their newly tested instrument for prying loose more of their imprisoned comrades held in Israeli and other jails. The day after the soldiers were returned to their homes, Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmad Yassin said his organization would intensify its efforts to kidnap Israelis to exchange them for more prisoners. Yassin's statement was echoed by Hezbollah's leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah. The two men happily proved to the world that their twisted hatred is alive and burrowing deep into the souls of the movements and people they lead.

The cruel and bloody irony was lost on no-one: on the very day Israel prepared to receive its sons, a suicide bomber struck in downtown Jerusalem. Thus, once again, Hamas and Hezbollah were joined in their fevered demonstrations of hatred by the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, which quickly claimed responsibility for sending the Palestinian police officer from Bethlehem to blow up Israelis. Eleven people were killed.

But as a poisoned well can neither nourish nor revive, hatred can never be the sustaining soil from which any people draws freedom and independence. The Palestinian people deserve better leaders.

Cpl. Jamie Murphy

Israelis were not the only ones targeted last week by suicide bombers. Cpl. Jamie Brendan Murphy, who was serving with our armed forces to defend and strengthen the Afhgani people against the Taliban oppressors, was also killed by a suicide bomber.

We salute Cpl. Murphy for his bravery and commitment to the betterment of humanity and convey our deep condolences to his family, friends and colleagues of soldiers. His murder proves again what we already know. Israel is only the first target. The West is targeted as well.

Radical Muslims have no say

After Libyan dictator Moammar Gadhafi decided to scrap his country's nuclear and chemical weapons, Arab countries reportedly began pressuring Israel to destroy its arsenal. Other than Egypt, Jordan and Turkey, which is not an Arab country, all the other countries in the Middle East have failed to recognize the existence of the State of Israel and maintain a state of war against it.

Whether Israel possesses nuclear weapons or not, all the enemies of Israel believe it does, and that those weapons have been successful in preventing it from being attacked once again as it was in 1948, 1967 and 1973. In addition to the animosity of the Arab countries, Hamas and Islamic Jihad, based in the West Bank and Gaza and funded and supported by Libya, have publicly stated that Israel must be destroyed. If radical Muslims want to indoctrinate their youth to carry out suicide bombings, that is one thing, but they are certainly in no position to call on Israel to take steps that would ensure its own destruction.

Transcend denominational rhetoric

In response to the article, "Orthodox historian foresees split in Conservative Judaism" (CJN, Jan. 22), a number of points need to be made.

First and foremost, most, if not all, of the Conservative movement's official positions have been deliberated on the basis of Halachah. One of the points Stephen Speisman fails to consider in the article is the ideology of halachic pluralism – namely, that one can conceivably arrive at different outcomes while adhering to the canons of the halachic process. For example, Conservative rabbis in Toronto who permit aliyot for women but who do not permit aliyot for women in services with men base both these positions on Halachah.

Secondly, the recognition of diversity in religious thought and practice is a basic reality in Jewish life today. There is not only diversity between denominations, but also within denominations. The ultra-Orthodoxy of Mea She'arim is vastly different in thought and behaviour from the liberal Orthodoxy of the Edah organization in New York. The traditional Conservative Judaism of Toronto is vastly different from the egalitarian Conservative Judaism of California. The patterns of Reform Judaism in Toronto differ greatly from the patterns of Reform Judaism in the United States. One ought not to cast stones at the diversity of religious expression. Rather, one should seek to understand and appreciate our similarities while disagreeing respectfully on our differences.

Finally, all expressions of Judaism continue to face the same ultimate challenge – namely, to encourage Jewish people to embrace their heritage, observe the mitzvot and love the land and people of Israel. Most would agree that Judaism is not an "all or nothing" tradition. Each step on the ladder leads to the next step, and each single mitzvah observed leads to another mitzvah.

Instead of castigating Conservative Judaism, or any other expression of Judaism, Speisman should transcend denominational rhetoric, which is often used to create divisions. Rather, we should all see each other as one Jewish family, klal Yisrael, in which we love each other and learn from each other.

Inspired by Troy

A friend forwarded me Gil Troy's column "Lo nafseek lirkod – we won't stop dancing," (CJN, Jan. 22), and I want to thank him for writing it.

My daughter was recently in Tel Aviv on a Birthright Israel trip and my heart fluttered slightly when she was there, but her deepening interest in and love for Israel more than overrode my fear.

We are deeply frustrated and angry at the prevailing Orwellian mindset at American college campuses today. My daughter attends one. But for us, the attacks on Israel have drawn us closer to that nation and strengthened the bond we feel with the Jewish state.

Where did she get her facts?

Smadar Meir-Ordynans' essay, "Reconciliation with the Palestinians is necessary – and possible" (CJN, Jan. 15), is confused.

Meir-Ordynans claims the Six Day War "began supposedly defensively." Even Israel's harshest critics agree there was nothing "supposed" about Israel's need to defend itself in 1967. But then the writer herself acknowledges this fact in her very next phrase, "as the Arabs began mobilizing against Israel." Why did she feel the need to use the word "supposedly"?

Later, Meir-Ordynans states that "it was only after the Six Day War that the Palestinians gained recognition as a distinct, displaced people." She's quite right, but she neglects to state the reason for this. Quite simply, before the Six Day War, the populations of the West Bank and Gaza Strip were content to remain under Jordanian and Egyptian rule respectively. It was only after Israel took control of these areas that the sudden need arose to create a Palestinian state on that territory.

Toward the end of the article, Meir-Ordynans writes: "One has to ask how did the Israelis and Palestinians go from almost reaching an agreement at Camp David in 2000… to a war that the present Israeli government is calling a 'fight for its existence?'" It got to that point because Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat walked away from the negotiating table and launched his murderous intifadah.

Finally, Meir-Ordynans says, "Both peoples have lived peacefully, more or less, for centuries in the same neighbourhood." Where, exactly, is she getting her information? Certainly not from any history I've read.

Three soldiers come home

A victory for Hezbollah?

By ZVI BAR'EL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

It has been a long time since Beirut saw a national gathering of the sort that greeted the Lebanese men who were freed in a prisoner exchange with Israel last week. President Emil Lahoud stood alongside his rival Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, Hezbollah leader Shiekh Hassan Nasrallah's greatest critic. Beside them was Shi'ite Parliament speaker Nabih Beri, the leader of the Amal party, Hezbollah's rival, while Maronite Cardinal Nasrallah Sfeir, Hezbollah's sworn enemy in Lebanon, was in the front row.

Hezbollah organized the show of national unity with great skill and with a careful measure of the two parts of the country: Hezbollah and the rest of Lebanon.

A Lebanese national song and the Hezbollah anthem were played, and the national flag flew alongside the Hezbollah flag. There was no doubt it was a Hezbollah affair – and they had sent the invitations to the rest of the country to be the guests of honour, as if Lebanon itself was one of the freed prisoners.

The Arab world's TV coverage, as if it was a joint decision, depicted it as a local Lebanese affair. While Al-Manara, the Hezbollah station, covered every second of the 24 hours that passed, Syrian TV practically ignored it, Jordanian TV gave it short notice, Egypt broadcast movies and almost ordinary news broadcasts, while Al-Jazeera, Al-Arabiya and other trans-Arab TV stations went from the initial ceremonies to the Jerusalem bombing and then to Iraq.

The gap between the Lebanese coverage, particularly Hezbollah's, and that of the rest of the Arab world symbolizes the event's significance for Hezbollah. At the very least, there is discomfort in the Arab world that a Shi'ite religious organization, defined by the West as terrorist and which regards most of the Arab regimes as pawns in the hands of the West and traitors to the Arab cause, succeeded where important leaders have failed.

Hezbollah succeeded twice: first by expelling Israel from south Lebanon and then by freeing Lebanon's prisoners (and some from other Arab countries), granting the term "resistance" a respectable status that can achieve victories.

But it was Nasrallah, who, even while trying to speak in Lebanon's name and even in the name of all Arab countries, set down the boundaries between the organization and the state. Hezbollah, and not Lebanon, will continue to deal with the prisoners, with the option of those continued negotations depending on the information about missing Israeli Air Force navigator Ron Arad and the creativity of the prisoner exchange plan's German mediator. But "we won't turn our prisoners into hostages of Ron Arad," Nasrallah promised, threatening, "we have another option, and it is for our fighters… to next time bring the hostages alive."

Once again, it is Hezbollah's private war. Even though for the first time Nasrallah expressed his appreciation of Israel for its efforts on behalf of its prisoners, he threatened in his name and the name of his organization that Israel's continued holding of Samir Kuntar for killing three of its citizens grants Hezbollah the opening to continue operations against the Jewish state. Nasrallah drew an analogy between Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon (while holding on to Shebaa Farms, leaving an opening for Hezbollah to continue armed resistance) and the prisoner exchange, which left Kuntar as a reason for Hezbollah to go on.

Nasrallah didn't just leave it at Kuntar. He added two more names – Nissim Nasser, the Israeli citizen under arrest for espionage for Hezbollah, and Yihiye Sakaf, whom Israel does not admit it is holding. Thus, he's trying to broaden the legitimacy of his struggle. It's doubtful that everyone who sat with him onstage last week in Beirut will join him in the effort. Nasrallah, who offered no surprises in his speech, is now preparing for stage two of the prisoner exchange plan. Will he come up with new information about Arad? His threats about new kidnappings and the creativity of the German mediator apparently signal that he's not so sure he'll actually have anything he'll be able to sell to Israel in exchange for Kuntar.

Sharon speaks to the families

Suwad family, Avitan family, Avraham family, ladies and gentlemen:

The reality of our lives enforces upon us at times the dreadful mixing of sadness with sadness, of sadness with joy. This morning, vicious Palestinian terror struck again in the heart of Jerusalem in the indiscriminate murder of innocent citizens.

Apparently, this is the price a society, which sanctifies the value of life, has to pay for living side-by-side with a society that does not lift a finger to root out the murder and evil from its midst. I convey my condolences to the families of the victims, and my best wishes for a speedy recovery to all the injured.

Adi Avitan

Benny Avraham

Omar Suwad

Omar, Adi and Benny set out on their last mission. Together, they fell by the murderous fire. Together, they return today to be buried in the soil of our home that they were sent to defend.

We, the entire Israeli people, stand here with heavy hearts, in the presence of the three coffins draped with our national flag. This is not a time of celebration, but one of relief and gratification. Relief – because three dear families whose souls did not know tranquility for 40 months, will now be able to express their deep mourning beside a modest grave. And gratification – for a promise which was fulfilled, for a commitment which was fully realized, for the moral and right decision which was taken in spite of its heavy price.

I fully understand the difficulties. The counter-arguments were also strong and just. However, one cannot escape difficult decisions. This is the task of leadership, and for this it is elected. We have taken all aspects into consideration, we have seriously considered and weighed all the information, and finally we placed on the scales a decisive weight: it is called "Jewish sentiment."

I have no other word to describe the decision to bring the boys home, to the soil of our homeland, carrying a heavy price other than a "Jewish decision." It is anchored in the legacy of Israel, and applies to everyone whose life can be saved, or who can be brought to rest in Israel. This is an essential moral commitment to every person in Israel, whether they are Jewish or have chosen to bond themselves with Israel. I have shouldered this commitment from the day on which I was honoured to command soldiers in battle. It has been valid and effective from that day on.

Our willingness to go a long way for the release of our captives and missing and kidnapped sons must not be misunderstood. The State of Israel will not allow any enemy or any terrorist organization to turn abduction or holding for ransom into a method. There are measures which we have not yet been taken, but, if, God forbid, the same circumstances re-occur, we will not hesitate to use them. This, too, is a commitment, and we better not be put to the test.

The State of Israel today thanks all those who helped bring our sons home: the Chancellor of Germany, Gerhard Schroeder, and Mr. Ernst Uhrlau. We appreciate their commitment to continue their efforts until Ron Arad is returned home, and we thank everyone who worked with them. We also want to thank those who worked for the return of the captives and missing – the team headed by Maj.-Gen. (Res.) Ilan Biran, people from the Israel Defence Forces, the Mossad and the General Security Services, who worked relentlessly on behalf of the families – anonymous people, whose names the Israeli public does not know – we hold them all in high esteem, and we thank them all today.

A great debt is repaid today. A debt of respect to our soldiers and to their bereaved and anguished families, the Avitan, Avraham and Suwad families. The hearts of the entire nation were beating with hope and shared fate. And also a debt of saving a life toward the Tennenbaum family, whose anxiety and hope touched every heart.

We now express our condolences to the families of our fallen who have returned to our land, and we will also support the families of our remaining sons, the captive and missing soldiers, with prayer and hope.

May the memories of our sons, Benny, Adi and Omar, be for a blessing.

From a fatal kidnapping to a tense exchange: a timeline

The following is a chronology of the saga of the three soldiers, Benny Avraham, Adi Avitan and Omar Suwad, who were kidnapped in Lebanon in October 2000.

• Oct. 7, 2000: First sergeants Avraham, Avitan and Suwad are kidnapped from their reconnaissance jeep on the Lebanese border at Shebaa Farms, or Har Dov.

• Oct. 9, 2000: The Israeli army announces that an examination of the reconnaisance jeep showed signs the soldiers were wounded during the kidnapping.

• Jan. 10, 2001: The Israeli army-appointed Peled committee rules that flaws in the northern command made the kidnapping possible.

• July 2001: A videotape made after the kidnapping by a soldier of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon is uncovered. It shows the cars that took the soldiers into Lebanon.

• August 2001: After a lengthy struggle with the United Nations, representatives of the general staff view the tape, but it does not shed light on the fate of the soldiers. The UN announces the soldiers are apparently dead, and that it has personal effects, soaked in blood, that were found in the kidnappers' cars.

• Oct. 29, 2001: In the wake of "new and credible" information, the Israeli army reaches the conclusion the soldiers were killed during the kidnapping or immediately afterward and are no longer alive.

• Nov. 2, 2001: Chief IDF Rabbi Brig.-Gen. Yisrael Weiss declares the soldiers fallen with their burial place unknown. The families of the three refuse to accept the decision.

• Nov. 9, 2003: Prime Minister Ariel Sharon brings a proposed prisoner exchange deal with Hezbollah to the cabinet for a decision. The deal would see the return to Israel of the bodies of Avraham, Avitan, Suwad and businessman Elhanan Tennenbaum in exchange the release by Israel of 435 prisoners – 400 Palestinians, 23 Lebanese and 12 nationals of other countries – as well as the bodies of 59 Lebanese who were buried in Israel.

Despite much criticism over the release of Lebanese prisoners Sheikh Abed Karim Obeid and Mustafa Dirani, considering bargaining chips for missing Air Force navigator Ron Arad, the deal is accepted by the government. There is a delay because of Israel's refusal to free Samir Kuntar, imprisoned for life for the murder of Nahariya police officer Eliahu Shahar, as well as the father and son of the Haran family, without getting information about what happened to Arad.

• Jan. 24, 2004: The prisoner deal is completed, and the matter of Arad and Kuntar is resolved by postponing it to a later date.

• Jan. 29, 2004: The three soldiers are returned home.

Opinions

Shabbat is getting later

Driving my grandchildren to their swimming lessons the other day, I observed that shabbat is starting later. As I manoeuvred along the unfamiliar roads of Long Island, N.Y., it was still light out at 5 p.m. and I could see where I was going. Daylight lasted longer this week than last, and I sighed with relief.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

I don't mean to complain, but this business of endless darkness and bone-chilling cold destroys normal human interaction. How can we accomplish anything when it gets dark so early? I find the winter months enervating. It is difficult if not impossible to be open and creative with all this nocturnal time. And the cold adds its own shattering force to our productivity and equilibrium.

I know that studies show people in hot countries are less productive. And I have seen the debilitating effects of extreme heat on most people. (I must admit, though, that I love the heat. Even 40 degrees celsius in Seville brought smiles to my face.) But in hot climates, at least there is a long period of daylight, after which things cool off and people can see each other and socialize. And it doesn't take an hour to put on all your outerwear.

What can you do in the winter? OK, you can ski. (Not me!) But even that is limited by daylight, and the cold does get to you.

So what's my point?

It seems to me that we humans need a certain amount of light in order to be hopeful. Not artificial light, but the natural light of the sun. It breeds optimism, as well as an acceptance of our human capabilities and social habits. It furthers human acceptance and neighbourliness.

Maybe I am becoming too romantic, but darkness at 4 p.m. is too much to bear. Sunlight at 8 is great.

There is something indefinable about going for a walk in the summer. I know what I am talking about because I walk to work every day. It takes me one hour and I do it no matter what the weather. And although I love the experience, I can assure you that it is better in the summer. I can even walk home.

"Summertime and the livin' is easy" in the words of George Gershwin's famous song.

Long hours of daylight allow for late-night dinners, evening concerts, street festivals, going out with friends – in other words, life! Summertime elevates these experiences and makes them commonplace.

So as Shabbat starts later and later, I feel we have turned the corner on the darkness. The cold and long nights are still with us for two more months (really three, as you can't trust April). Nonetheless, it's time for a little optimism: summer is coming.

Failing the Jewish ethics test

I have just spent five weeks in the United States travelling, visiting friends and family, and taking the advice of that venerable sage Yogi Berra, who said "You can hear a lot by listening." America is still recovering from the Sept. 11 attacks, and its convalescence has brought both good and pernicious effects to its civil society.

The United States is still a vital and exciting country, determined to overcome terrorism. But the level of anxiety, the cold suspicious eye and the aggressive, not to say ruthless, exploitation of that tragic day are some of the bad effects of 9/11.

Alas, current U.S. politics and policies at home and abroad have not created either harmony domestically or goodwill beyond America's shores. Recovery from the trauma of 9/11 – which gave Americans a sense of domestic vulnerability for the first time – mixed with ultra-conservative governance bodes ill for the near future.

My experiences in the United States made me reflect on our role as Jews in Canada in assessing our own society. Listening to friends, who range from Rush Limbaugh fans to '60s peaceniks, reminded me of the actions of our own Canadian governments and how their policies can be judged against a Jewish ethical framework.

Several fail the test. For instance:

On caring for the poor, as in the United States, tax cuts in Canada have benefited the wealthiest. Federal and provincial sales taxes may be egalitarian in that everyone pays them, but obviously a poor person is less able to shoulder the burden than a wealthy one.

Taxes should fund services that we all need, such as medical services, education and the care of our cities. Small government, the goal of neo-conservatives, means fewer public services. Nobody likes paying taxes. But governments can only fulfil their duties to citizens if they have the resources. Are we to be a caring society, or one that allows the needy to be sold for a pair of shoes?

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Another example: Do not put a stumbling block in front of the blind. A society such as the United States, where 15 per cent of the population has no medical coverage, is a failed society by Jewish standards. The situation for Canadians is not, thank God, as dire, but attacking fair and universal medical coverage and preventative medicine is equivalent to making the blind stumble. Those who want to devalue, and ultimately destroy, the medical system we have by starving it of funds and then promoting a two-tier system are headed in that direction. In British Columbia, for example, much preventive care is now de-listed, because tax cuts have drained the treasury. Although we can find $1 billion for the 2010 Vancouver/Whistler Winter Olympics, these cuts make the blind and disabled stumble. They fail the ethics test.

A third example: Maimonides' highest rung of tzedakah is to enable a person in need to become self-sufficient. Hebrew Free Loan societies were founded on this principle, enabling people to leave poverty and become independent. What have so-called "welfare reforms" done? In British Columbia, people on income assistance no longer receive even the paltry $200 per month they used to get. Many retraining programs have also been cut, leaving people worse off. They're totally dependent on hand-outs until benefits run out, when they're often left without the skills to help themselves. Alternatively, they may be relegated to society's lowest paying jobs, which invariably keep them mired in poverty. These policies do not meet the Jewish ethics test.

Finally, we are enjoined to ransom captives. Jewish communities since antiquity have pooled money to buy Jews enslaved or held for ransom. Today we are justly proud of the money we raise to resettle Russians in Israel or ransom and rescue Jews in Ethiopia. But thousands of Falash Mora remain in limbo in Ethiopia while Israel and Jewish leaders dither. Are there so many Jews in the world that we can afford to abandon these people? We in North America must use our influence to resettle the Falash Mora (many of whom have relatives in Israel), as we have done for so many before.

As a Canadian by choice, I have found our country to be a place of sane social policy. I would hate to see it imitate the tortured policies of our neighbour to the south. Fidelity to halachic and ethical standards must guide us as citizens, and we must never cease to communicate these values to our leaders.

Our natural environment has no borders

My childhood memories of Tu b'Shvat are dominated by the Jewish National Fund's tree- buying programs. I recall buying tiny stickers in January and February, a few at a time, and placing them on my personal tree poster hung at the back of the classroom. I also have vague memories of looking at JNF film strips that showed some of Israel's flora and fauna. I must confess that looking at pictures of lush Israeli greenery during the chill of a Winnipeg winter made me feel more jealous than Zionistic.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

Over the years, Tu b'Shvat was one of those holidays that slipped out of my consciousness. In early February, I'm still full from Chanukah and can't wrap my head around a holiday recognizing spring when a blast of prairie winter wind gushes down my throat at the bus stop.

But, like most things Jewish, when you pause and reflect about Tu b'Shvat, you see it has a great deal of relevance. The day that commemorates the "new year of the trees" is an opportunity to consider Judaism's relationship with the environment as well as one's own environmental footprint.

The Tanach, the Midrash and rabbinical commentaries are rich with insights about humanity's relationship with the physical world. For beginners, Jewishly inspired environmentalists will point to the beginning, the book of Genesis: "God took the man and placed him in the Garden of Eden, to till it and tend it."

One translation I've seen replaces the word "tend" with "preserve." According to Ecclesiastes Rabbah, in showing Adam the Garden of Eden, God said: "See my works, see how beautiful and perfect they are, and all I created – I created for you. Beware lest you spoil and destroy my world, for if you spoil it, there is no one to repair it after you."

In a 2000 lecture, noted environmental expert and author Manfred Gerstenfeld identified other connections between Judaism and the environment. For example, he said biodiversity was assured when Noah populated the ark with the animals of the world. Gerstenfeld, author of Judaism, Environmentalism and the Environment, also points to Jewish laws that speak to environmental protection. The law of bal tashchit, for example, prohibits wanton destruction. According to Gerstenfeld, rabbinical literature extended bal tashchit to include the prohibition against blocking water sources, and the Talmud includes the uneconomical consumption of fuel.

Gerstenfeld also looks at tzar ba'alei chaim (the prohibition against cruelty to animals) and to more contemporary halachic commentaries.

In 2002 at the UN World Summit on Sustainable Development in Johannesburg, South Africa, then-Israeli foreign minister Shimon Peres made it clear in an address that environmental issues are issues of broad, mutual concern and when neglected or pre-empted by politics, lead to troublesome results: "The polemics that rage in the region undermine dialogue, and the terror that has washed over it has given birth to distrust. As a result, the desert is eroding the fertile soil and the conflicts prevent the water from flowing along its natural and logical course," said Peres. "At home, we clasp our national passports, but to Johannesburg, we have come carrying global identity cards."

Indeed, as Peres suggested, environmental issues have no political boundaries. The planet is warming, forests are disappearing, water resources are drying up. While there are some important examples of regional co-operation already underway, further co-operation among Israel and its neighbours cannot wait for other issues to be solved.

Equally important, people of all backgrounds must take action – as individuals, as communities and as nations – to preserve and improve our natural environment. In the Jewish community, we must encourage our synagogues and community centres to put environmental issues on the programming agenda. We must acknowledge the richness of environmental references in Jewish literature and seek ways to act.

On Tu b'Shvat, when we plant a tree in Israel, we are not just helping Israel, we are helping the entire planet. Similarly, we do the entire planet a great service when we recycle, reduce our fuel consumption and save electricity. We do a great disservice when we don't.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

The following books, touching on broad themes ranging from Israel and the Middle East to the Diaspora and the Holocaust, were published recently.

Yaacov Lozowick, in Right to Exist (Random House), has written a nuanced analysis about Israel's struggle for existence. The breakdown of Israel's peace talks with the Palestinians and the outbreak of the Palestinian uprising shattered his assumptions regarding the prospect of a rapprochement with the Palestinians and prompted him to question his own views as a liberal and a peace activist. This is a sober examination of Zionism and the Palestinian national movement, and a call for realism.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The Other Israel (The New Press), edited by Roane Carey and Jonathan Shainin, contains essays by Israeli and American writers on the Arab-Israeli dispute. They argue that Israel's occupation of the territories has undermined its democratic ideals and liberal values and distorted the achievements of Zionism. Wrestling with Zion (Grove Press), which covers similar terrain from the same orientation, is edited by Tony Kushner and Alisa Solomon.

The history of Zionist settlement in Palestine, an enterprise that enlisted town planners as well as the military, is the subject of S. Ilan Troen's fascinating book Imagining Zion (Yale University Press). In Israelis and Palestinians (Yale University Press), Bernard Wasserstein states that certain realities – demography, environmental pressures and the like – will drive them toward a diplomatic solution.

Palestinian Politics After the Oslo Accords (University of California Press), by Nathan Brown, is a cogent analysis of state building in the Palestinian Authority. Brown examines such related topics as the rule of law, corruption and constitutionalism. Giora's Goldberg's Ben-Gurion Against the Knesset (Frank Cass) is a thorough study of the first Israeli prime minister's prickly relationship with the Knesset and his role in the development of parliamentary institutions in Israel.

In Arafat's War (Grove Press), Efraim Karsh, a professor of Mediterranean studies at the University of London, claims that the president of the Palestinian Authority is less interested in a Palestinian state than in Israel's destruction. And in Yasir Arafat: A Political Biography (Oxford University Press), Barry Rubin and Judith Colp Rubin maintain that Arafat has inflicted unnecessary suffering on his people by clinging to the belief that a political solution of the Arab-Israeli dispute "means surrender."

Lee Levine's Jerusalem: Portrait of the City in the Second Temple Period (The Jewish Publication Society) is an intriguing account of Jerusalem's evolution as an important religious and cultural centre from 538 B.C.E. to 70 C.E. In Entebbe: A Defining Moment in the War on Terrorism (Balfour), Iddo Netanyahu recounts the daring 1976 Israeli raid in Uganda during which his older brother, Jonathan, a commando, was killed. This is an ode to heroism.

The Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks in the United States concentrated minds yet again on Islamic fundamentalism. Jihad: The Trail of Political Islam (Harvard University Press), by Gilles Kepel, isolates the challenge posed by Islamism and concludes that violence is a "death trap" for Islamists. Jane Corbin, in Al-Qaeda (Raincoast), has written a penetrating analysis of an Islamic organization hell-bent on expelling all Western influence in the Middle East. Dilip Hiro's The Essential Middle East (Raincoast) is a useful reference work, but his comments on Israel are biased.

The Iraq War (Harvard University Press) is the first major work on the 2003 allied invasion of Iraq. The expertise of the authors, Williamson Murray and Robert Scales, is clear. Israel's occupation of the Palestinian autonomous areas in March 2002 was witnessed by Ramallah-based writer Raja Shehadeh. In When the Birds Stopped Singing (Steerforth Press), he recalls the invasion and gauges its effect on the Palestinians. Al-Jazeera, the Arab cable television news network, has rattled and infuriated Arabs and Israelis alike and redefined Arab journalism. In Al-Jazeera (Westview Press), Mohammed El-Nawawy and Adel Iskandar trace its history as the CNN of the Arab world.

Martin Gottfried, in Arthur Miller (Da Capo Press), deftly profiles a great American playwright. Gerald Sorin, in Irving Howe (New York University Press), produces a substantial biography of an influential American intellectual. U.S. mobster Arnold Rothstein fixed the 1919 World Series and was the mastermind of the modern drug trade. Biographer David Pietrusza distills his life in Rothstein (Raincoast).

The late American movie critic Pauline Kael graced the pages of The New Yorker with her trenchant reviews, and in Afterglow (Da Capo Press), Francis Davis has one last conversation with her about the craft of film. Abraham Joshua Heschel (The Jewish Publication Society), by Or Rose, is billed as the first children's biography of this towering rabbinic figure. The March 25, 1911, fire in the Triangle garment factory was the worst workplace disaster in Manhattan's history. The owners of the plant were Jewish, as were many of its victims. Triangle: The Fire that Changed America (Raincoast), by David von Drehle, recreates that awful day with consummate skill.

Sir Philip Sassoon (1888-1939) and his sister, Sybil (1894-1989) were the British descendants of a wealthy Sephardi family that prospered in India and China. Philip was a politician, while Sybil married into the aristocracy. Sassoon: The Worlds of Philip and Sybil (Yale University Press) by Peter Stansky examines interlocking themes such as wealth and power and politics and Jewishness. Todd Endelman's magisterial history of British Jewry, The Jews of Britain 1656 to 2000 (University of California Press), is rich in narrative and personalities. In Jurek Becker: A Life in Five Worlds (The University of Chicago Press), Sander Gilman paints a vivid picture of a Jewish writer whose best known novel is probably Jacob the Liar. Clive Brown's A Portrait of Mendelssohn (Yale University Press) is a rigorous biography of 19th century classical composer Felix Mendelssohn. Marsha Edelman, in Discovering Jewish Music (The Jewish Publication Society), ranges far and wide, commenting knowingly on subjects ranging from chazzanut to Israeli folk songs. An accompanying CD is taped to the inside back cover. Benjamin Harshav's Marc Chagall (Stanford University Press) is the newest biography of a momentous artist. It explores his relationship with his Jewish, Russian and French identities, his roots in folk culture, his artistic journey and his involvement in politics and Yiddish literature.

One of the strangest incidents of the Holocaust is related by Ronald Zweig in The Gold Train (HarperCollins). The controversy ignited by the wartime massacre of Jews in the Polish village of Jedwabne is revisited in The Neighbors Respond (Princeton University Press), edited by Antony Polonsky and Joanna Michlic. The Bielski Brothers (HarperCollins), by Peter Duffy, is the story of three Jewish brothers who built an effective partisan band-cum community in the forests of eastern Europe.

After the war, Holocaust survivors in the British zone of occupied Germany began rebuilding their lives, and in New Beginnings (Wayne State University Press), Hagit Lavsky explores these nascent Jewish communities. Many years later, some survivors launched class action lawsuits to recover their property. In The Victim's Fortune (HarperCollins), John Authers and Richard Wolffe investigate this international struggle. And in Holocaust Justice (New York University Press), Marshall Bazyler zeroes in on the battle for restitution in American courts.

Daniel Levitas, in The Terrorist Next Door (Thomas Dunne), examines the historical roots of the far-right, anti-Semitic militia movement in the United States. The Dent Atlas of Jewish History (J.M. Dent), by Martin Gilbert, and the Atlas of Jewish History (Routledge), by Dan Cohn Sherbok, are first-rate reference works.

And in general... World Factbook (Raincoast) is a handy reference guide to every country under the sun. Canadian Oxford World Atlas (Oxford University Press) is ideal for home, school and office.

These coffee-table books reveal exotic places through stunning photography and concise text: Amazonia (Firefly) is an overview of an awesome tropical rainforest. Sahara (Raincoast) profiles the stark beauty and hardy inhabitants of a vast desert. Deserts (Firefly), a blend of colour photos, illustrations, diagrams and maps, describes an intimidating landscape. Israel's Negev region is included. South Sea Islands (Firefly) is a celebration of unique flora and fauna in a faraway destination. The Lonely Planet guidebooks, distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada, are reliable travel companions. The latest ones: Mediterranean Europe, Eastern Europe, Central Europe, Sicily, Estonia, Latvia & Lithuania, Middle East, Morocco, West Africa, Vietnam and Myanmar.

In high style, The Group of Seven and Tom Thomson (Firefly) celebrates the achievements of a school of iconic Canadian painters. Old Toronto Houses (Firefly) is a primer of Toronto's rich architectural heritage. Halliwell's 2004 Film Guide (HarperCollins) lists thousands of films, and is the last word on the subject. David Wragg's Jane's Air Forces of the World (HarperCollins) highlights the importance of air power in combat and features a chapter on the Israeli Air Force. And finally, the Oxford Dictionary of English (Oxford University Press) is an excellent reference work.

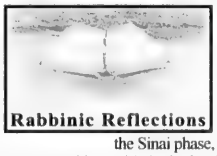
What makes us Jews? Blood and belief

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS



The Jew lives in two worlds – in the Jewish world and in the wider world as an individual Jew.

After the Jews are saved with the splitting of the Red Sea, they break into spontaneous song, the Song of the Sea, in Exodus, Chapter 15.

One verse of this song is richly nuanced and has many interpretations: "This is my God and I will praise Him, the God of my fathers and I will exalt Him" (Exodus 15:2).

What does Moses mean to convey with this couplet and with the words "my God and God of my fathers?" What does he gain by describing God as both his own and his fathers'? The Jewish people are a people of belief, so obviously Moses' belief is the same as that of his forefathers.

In his comments, Rashi says Moses meant that "I am not the beginning of holiness, but holiness and Godliness has been rooted in me and remains with me since the time of my forefathers."

Rav Soloveitchik explained this Rashi commentary by employing a principle that was a core principle in the Rav's philosophy: There are two pieces to our Jewish living and our Jewish belief – people and personal. We are Jews because we are born Jewish, we are part of the Jewish family. In the Torah, this is the theme of the book of Genesis. Abraham and Sarah are the first Jews – and the promise of the Land is made to their descendants, their family. All those who are children of Israel are Jews. This is a blood connection, a big and sometimes happy family.

Then there is a second phase of Jewish history – the Sinai phase, the book of Exodus phase. This is the book of belief, of mitzvot, of personal responsibility. The splitting of the Red Sea was a great moment of inspiration and revelation, and hence brought a deep personal belief in God.

This is Moses' emphasis in this verse. "This is My God – I have gone beyond the belief of my forefathers – I have ventured into my own personal relationship with God, I have experienced something which has created a personal belief – on top of the belief of my fathers."

There are two aspects to Jewish living – we are a part of the Jewish people and we are individuals, grappling with our belief and our mitzvot, aspiring to the Torah ideal. There is peoplehood and there is religious expression.

The Talmud says even though a Jew sins, he remains a Jew. This is the people aspect. It must be stated clearly and unequivocally – regardless of how a Jew lives, he remains a Jew, a part of the people. The concern of one Jew for another, the concern of a haredi Jew for an assimilated Jew, the concern of a Reform Jew for the well-being of a black-hat Jew, the concern of a Zionist Israeli for a Jew from Peru – these concerns are the worry of a person for their family. This is the people, the family of Abraham, the book of Genesis.

At the same time, the Torah has Exodus as well. Full holiness is established through mitzvot. Full holiness requires the personal engagement of the Torah. Here we do not rest on our laurels. We must engage the Torah directly. This is what Rashi means by introducing the world "holiness" – full holiness requires personal engagement.

We could all use a little push from this Rashi – strengthening our "God of our fathers," our bonds to our people and "my God," the completing of our holiness through our personal engagement in the business of mitzvot.

Rabbi Tradburks is spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah in Toronto.

Tu b'Shvat, Israel and the environment

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Saturday, Feb. 7 is Tu b'Shvat, the traditional Jewish New Year for trees. Long a day celebrated mostly by schoolchildren [www.jafi.org.il/education/festivls/tubish/], Tu b'Shvat has also become a day to celebrate the environmental successes that Israel has achieved and to look at the country's ecological future.

The story of the reclamation of the land of Israel is well-known [www.israel.org/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00uq0]. But before most of us knew anything about Israel's environment, we knew about the little blue box. Weighed down by pennies and nickels, the Jewish National Fund pushke meant another tree was going to be planted somewhere in Israel [www.jnf.org/site/PageServer?pagename=BlueBox]. You can read up on the famous box and even take a look at how it has changed over the past century [www.jnf-canada.org/bluebox/bluebox.htm].

To find out what is happening to Israel's environment right now, I recommend visiting [www.jgenisrael.org/]. The articles are well-written and interesting, but also challenging. The current issue also focuses on the drying up of vast sections of the Dead Sea, the consequences of Israel's reliance on fossil fuels and the sewage that pollutes some of Israel's rivers. An article about urban expansion and the loss of farmland is pointedly titled "The Land of Asphalt and Cement." On the other hand, you can read the story of Rob Zorbin, who rode his bicycle from Neve Shalom to Eilat to honour his father who, in 1932, fled Poland by bicycle and arrived in Tel Aviv six weeks later.

I'm not quite sure why, but I am addicted to the Mekorot website. It's not that I'm a devotee of hydrology in Hebrew. But the page has a small graphic of a yardstick that tells you that day's level of Lake Kinneret, Israel's most famous reservoir of fresh water. Thanks to two rainy seasons (and despite years of drought and overpumping), the lake's level has been rising steadily. I've been checking on the Kinneret daily to see whether it will finally reach capacity of 208.9 metres below sea level for the first time in a decade. This year looks pretty good [www.mekorot.co.il/frameset.asp].

Although reaching capacity is wonderful, Israel still faces a water crisis since many of the country's aquifers and other sources of water are still relatively depleted. To help ease the crisis, the country is looking at alternatives such as importing water from Turkey [http://makeashorterlink.com/?L4BB33437]. A huge water desalination plant is under construction in Ashkelon. When completed, it will be able to turn seawater into 110 million cubic metres of desalinated water annually [www.water-technology.net/projects/israel/].

From the seas, let's look to the skies and a site titled "Migrating Birds Know No Boundaries." That's the slogan of Israel's International Center for the Study of Bird Migration. Located at the intersection of three continents, Israel has long been known as a birder's paradise. Although nothing can compare to the sight and sound of a long-sought-after bird, the site comes pretty close. You can track the patterns of birds migrating through the country and find details about birds that are common there. (Have you seen a yellow-vented bulbul lately?) [www.birds.org.il/show_item.asp?levelId=457]

Speaking of no boundaries, several Israeli environmental groups maintain close contact with their neighbours. Friends of the Middle East is an umbrella organization for environmentalists in Israel, the West Bank and Jordan, and maintains offices in Tel Aviv, Bethlehem and Amman. It focuses its efforts on transboundary ecosystems such as the Dead Sea Basin and the Gulf of Aqaba [www.foeme.org/]. To read up on the work done by Israel's many other environmental groups, visit the links page created by The Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life [www.coejl.org/action/israelorg.shtml].

Next time you're in Israel, you may want to see Israel's environmental achievements first-hand. The Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel organizes eco tours that most tourists wouldn't dream of participating in, such as hiking through canyons in the Negev or tubing down rivers in the north [www. teva.org.il/e/].

But just because you're not in Israel right now doesn't mean you can't do something for the country's environment in honour of Tu b'Shvat. Even if you can't track down your JNF blue box, all you have to do is go to the Keren Kayemet website, choose a forest, fill out the form and maybe your tree will be there the next time you're in the country [http://192.116.234.203/kkl/].

Jewish Life

We need to fight free of envy: author

Envy* by Joseph Epstein, Oxford University Press, $22.95.

Envy is pervasive and seemingly irrepressible. It is hatred without a cure, and according to the biblical Book of Proverbs, it makes the bones rot.

Envy turns us into grievance collectors: Why do we always end up with the short end of the stick? Why does my neighbour's chicken always look like a goose?

Books
Bernard Baskin

Schadenfreude is the emotion that delights in another person's failure or defeat. Author Gore Vidal expressed what most of us would never admit. "Every time a friend succeeds, I die a little."

The grocery-gutter press, which might also be called "The National Schadenfreude," trumpets in its headlines: "Oprah has gained 60 pounds while binge feeding. Britney Spear's boyfriend is cheating on her. Cher's daughter is in deep trouble. Whitney Houston hasn't licked her drug problems. Another of the Kennedy grandchildren has done something disgraceful. Donald Trump is being hauled into court for still higher alimony. The score is evening out and the world is a more just place than one might at first have thought."

Envy is the first in a series of slender volumes by a variety of authors on the seven deadly sins. Unlike other sins, Epstein muses, envy is no fun at all.

Envy, bitterness, jealousy and resentment are especially strong in the academic environment, he writes. University teaching seems like a good life, but it is soon spoiled by the realization that people who did less well than they in school seem to be faring rather better in the world.

"Not quite first-class lawyers are making hundreds of thousands of dollars a year; dullish boys and girls, now practising medicine, have large summer homes near gentle lakes. Coarse creeps are scoring heavily in the stock and commodities markets. While they [who were] once the darlings of their teachers are struggling along… No, it's not working out at all, and it's damned unfair."

Envy is not unmixed with malice, and the author suggests that both played a part in the horror of the Holocaust. The Jews of Germany and Austria had been successful not only beyond their numbers, but also, in the eyes of the jealous and resentful, beyond their right – and they had to suffer.

The author points out that the Nazis, though they killed Jews on a vaster scale than any others, seemed to need to humiliate their victims first. In Germany and Austria, they had Jewish women cleaning floors, had Jewish physicians scrubbing the cobblestone streets of Vienna with toothbrushes as Nazi youth urinated on them, and forced elderly Jews to do hundreds of deep knee bends until they fainted or sometimes died. All this suggests a vicious need to even up of the score that has the ugly imprint of envy on the loose all over it.

Epstein confides, "Although as a Jew I have never in any sense felt 'chosen,' I, not infrequently, have felt a special sense of privilege, even snobbish superiority at what I take to be the good luck of my having been born Jewish. Having been born in America, I am able to be both part of a great nation, and, having been born Jewish, simultaneously just a bit outside it, too. Not at all a bad position to be in, certainly for one who writes."

Included in this thoughtful and entertaining short work are the thoughts and insights of philosophers and thinkers such as Arthur Schopenhauer, Friedrich Nietzsche, John Rowls and William Hazlitt.

Envy, concludes the author, is just poor mental hygiene. "It clouds thought, clobbers generosity, precludes any hope of serenity, and ends in shrivelling the heart – reasons enough to fight free of it with all one's mental strength."

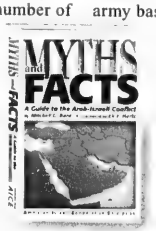
How can Israel protect its citizens from attacks?

MYTH:

Releasing Palestinian prisoners is a good way to build confidence for the peace process without endangering Israeli security.

FACT:

Israel has released Palestinian prisoners from its jails on a number of occasions because the Palestinians have made this a major issue and said that it would build confidence in the peace process. To date, however, it is difficult to find evidence that these prisoner releases have done anything to improve the prospects for peace. They have not moderated Palestinian behaviour nor prompted the Palestinian Authority to fulfil its obligations under the road map peace plan to dismantle terrorist networks and confiscate illegal weapons.



Israel has naturally been reluctant to release prisoners because they are in jail for good reason: they committed crimes, often violent ones. Moreover, when Israel makes these political and humanitarian gestures, the criminals often resume their terrorist activities.

In the summer of 2003, for example, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon responded to entreaties of the Palestinians and the international community to release prisoners as a way to help bolster the stature of then-prime minister Mahmoud Abbas. Even though the road map peace plan says nothing about the subject, Sharon released 350 Palestinians. Not long after, two of the former prisoners, under the command of a third, carried out suicide bombings at Café Hillel in Jerusalem and the Tzrifin army base, killing 15 civilians and soldiers, and wounding more than 80. Releasing prisoners is another example of one of the great risks that Israel has often taken for peace.

MYTH:

Israel's policy of assassinating terrorists is illegal and rejected even by some Israelis, as evidenced by the refusal of air force pilots to carry out the policy.

FACT:

As noted elsewhere, Israel faces a difficult quandary in deciding how best to protect its citizens from terrorist attacks. The government believes one way to reduce the danger is to target the Palestinians responsible for these war crimes. The Israeli army never targets innocent Palestinians and numerous examples can be cited of cases where pilots have returned to base without firing because civilians were in danger of being harmed. Still, tragedies have occurred in which innocent Palestinians have been casualties of the war against terror.

It is especially because of the concern for the innocent, and the difficulty of targeting terrorists who intentionally hide among civilians, that Israelis debate whether targeted attacks are the best policy. The public overwhelmingly supports the policy to date, and only 27 pilots – 18 whom are retired – signed a letter saying they wouldn't carry out missions in the territories. As in an earlier case where a group of reserve soldiers said they wouldn't serve either, the decision is a political act that has no place in any military, and did not receive popular support either from their fellow soldiers or the general public.

The pilots are entitled to their opinion and to express it through Israel's vibrant democratic process, but like other soldiers, their duty while in uniform is to implement policies made by elected civilian leaders so long as their orders are recognized by Israel's courts as legal. Both Israel's courts and international law allow for the current Israeli policy.

Meanwhile, the political debate as to the wisdom and effectiveness of the policy will undoubtedly continue.

School administrators examine fundraising at two-day conference

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

These days, one of the most important courses attended by school administrators may well be Fundraising 101.

Close to 70 principals, administrators and board members from across the spectrum of Jewish schools spent two days last week at a conference devoted to resource development, issues of governance and marketing strategies.

Since high tuition remains the largest barrier to entry into the Jewish education system, administrators would prefer not to increase their fees. However, with costs steadily rising above revenues, schools are searching for alternative sources of income.

Shirley Worth, Jewish Toronto Tomorrow's director of donor development, said the two-day program was intended to give the schools exposure to top people in the fields of resource development.

"Schools have become aware that raising money is a community issue and that everyone needs to be involved in creative fundraising programs," Worth said.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow joined with the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to present speakers who have experience promoting, marketing and running organizational systems.

> 'Raising money is a community issue'

The workshops included discussions on endowments, capital and annual campaigns, marketing Jewish day school education and effective governance.

One group, led by Carol Kassel, looked at creating multi-million-dollar endowments through life insurance programs, Worth said. Another panel, headed by Charles Novogrodsky, a consultant on organizational development, discussed creating effective boards.

While administrators looked at ways to increase their revenues, they also heard that the percentage of students from the total community who are registered in Jewish schools may actually be decreasing.

On one hand, the number of students registered in day schools has increased over the past decade, said York University professor Alex Pomson. However, the number may simply reflect a dramatic shift from supplementary to day school education.

In fact, Pomson suggested that since the early 1990s, "the proportion of Jewish children in Toronto who at some point in their lives receive a day-school education has probably declined."

Seymour Epstein, vice-president of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, spoke about the importance of reaching out to the non-committed communities for growth.

Epstein pointed to the Russian speaking and Israeli communities as new groups that need to be brought into the "vibrant centre."

"We need to find new comfort zones where these populations will feel comfortable.

"These families shouldn't be cheated out of their heritage," Epstein said, adding that there is a "Middle Income Mildly Affiliated" sector that does not feel compelled to be involved.

Everyone benefits when we bring in new students. Individual schools fill unused chairs and the community benefits by recapturing unaffiliated members and preserving Jewish life for the future, Epstein said.

More funds for hate crime unit

B.C. pledge comes amid furor over article in Muslim paper

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to the CJN

VICTORIA — It was sheer coincidence, but the timing was right.

In a meeting last month with a delegation of representatives of minority groups that included the Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region (CJC), Solicitor General Rich Coleman and B.C. Premier Gordon Campbell said the provincial government would boost its funding and support for the B.C. Hate Crime Team, which investigates and keeps statistics on hate crimes in the province.

The pledge came shortly after the appearance of a virulently anti-Semitic diatribe in the Delta, B.C.-based Muslim newspaper The Miracle. In a Dec. 19 article, Edgar J. Steele, who is known in the United States for his racist views, wrote that Jews were behind both world wars, the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and U.S. organized crime, among a long list of accusations that also included faking the Holocaust.

Congress gave copies of the paper to the Hate Crime Team, which will determine if there are grounds for criminal action.

"Hate speech of this nature, designed for the purpose of inciting people to commit acts against an identifiable group, that's chargeable," said Nisson Goldman, chair of CJC, Pacific region. "The newspaper certainly could be fined, and there may even be an imprisonment, though I doubt seriously that that would happen."

Prior to the article's appearance, the groups had already called the meeting with Coleman and Campbell to express concern about an "increase in various expressions of racism and homophobia in B.C.," CJC said in a statement.

In previous discussions with the province about the Hate Crime Team, CJC expressed dissatisfaction that the provincial unit, an arm of Coleman's ministry, has had its funding decreased since the Liberal government took office. As a result of those cuts, CJC contends, the unit has not been able to do outreach and education or fill vacant positions, including hiring a data analyst and seconding a Vancouver police officer to join the unit's full-time RCMP officer.

"We want the restoration of the B.C. Hate Crime Team to full capacity," said Goldman, meaning two police officers, an office worker, a statistician and a prosecutor.

If all goes as planned, the team will be restored in the next 30 to 60 days, once a new police officer is appointed, Coleman told The CJN.

"We really need to find someone who's knowledgeable about this issue, it can't just be anyone," he explained.

"And it's important that we educate people generally, not just a couple of people on a hate crimes team, to understand what a hate crime actually is."

After the appearance of the article in The Miracle, B.C. Liberal Senator Mobina Jaffer, a periodic contributor to the paper, said she will no longer write for it, while Liberal MP Joe Peschisolido was among many advertisers who cancelled future ads.

The paper has since published an appeal for voluntary $1 payments for the previously free publication, "to compensate the financial loss faced due to the withdraw [sic] of its advertisers."

Daud Ismail, president of the B.C. Muslim Association, which represents 50,000 B.C. Muslims, wrote a letter to the editor of the Western Jewish Bulletin, the Lower Mainland's Jewish weekly, condemning the article.

"In response to this hateful and malicious article, the B.C. Muslim Association has taken the liberty of prohibiting the circulation of this newspaper at all of its mosques and centres," he wrote.

Peschisolido also wrote to the Bulletin, declaring: "I regret placing any advertisements in The Miracle in the past. I am appalled that such an article would appear in any newspaper."

The Miracle has sought legal advice "in order to face any eventualities," and recently held a forum with members of the Muslim community to discuss the community's response to Steele's article, according to a short report on the meeting published in a recent edition of the newspaper.

"Everyone present agreed with the view of [chief editor Nusrat] Hussain, who himself condemned the article and called it a bad choice for publishing," wrote one of the paper's staff reporters. "However he defended the right of freedom of speech in Canada and termed it unfortunate that the CJC, instead of resolving the matter mutually, proceeded with a complaint to Hate Crime Unit."

Hussain, who had previously refused to apologize for the article, printed one on the front page of the Jan. 23 issue.

"As chief editor of The Miracle, I would like to apologize for publishing the article 'It Wasn't Arabs' by Edgar J. Steele," Hussain wrote. "Publication of the article offended and hurt the feelings of many throughout Canada and beyond, which was not intended."

But Hussain also penned a rambling opinion piece that appeared in the Jan. 23 Western Jewish Bulletin, in which he called Steele a "regular reader" and attempted to justify the publication of his article.

"Its publication was intended to present both sides of the coin so that someone could respond to the article in a befitting manner so that none would dare to write such things in the future," Hussain wrote.

"When the article was published, it was thought that some intellectual from the Jewish or the Muslim community would deliver a befitting response. It is sad to mention that there has been no such response. But I am confident about the richness of the Jewish community regarding intellectuals, and that sooner or later someone will emerge to deal with such issues in an honourable and justified manner that will be acceptable to all people of reason."

Western media can help spur reform in Arab world

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The pressing need for liberal reform within the Arab world was a recent topic for Mideast analyst Barry Rubin, writing in the Globe and Mail, and New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman.

In "The vanishing liberal Arab" (Globe and Mail, Jan. 23) Rubin writes that "the Middle East has been more effective at exporting authoritarian and extremist thought to the West than the West has been in exporting democratic thinking to the Middle East. Look, for example, at the global wave of anti-Semitism, the wacky views of the region held by so many in Europe and the United States, the intellectuals who apologize for terrorism, media coverage which becomes increasingly bizarre, radical Islamist activities in Europe and the way Middle East studies are taught in university classrooms. Who is having more impact on whom?"

Friedman devoted his first columns of 2004 to a series titled "The War of Ideas," which explored "the tactics we in the West can adopt to strengthen the moderates in the Arab-Muslim world." In the final instalment, "The War of Ideas, Part 6" (New York Times, Jan. 25), he argues that Europe must lead the way by investing in North Africa and the Middle East – "its natural backyard." So far, he says, Europe has failed miserably in this task, a problem compounded by three key factors that are absent or deficient in most of the Arab world – "infrastructure, productivity, education." Hence the need to work with Arab governments on a number of levels.

As well, writes Friedman, "Europe has done an extremely poor job of integrating and employing its growing Muslim minorities, many of which have a deep feeling of alienation." Consequently, "Europe has been the real factory of Arab-Muslim rage."

Yet it is the United States and Israel that all too often get blamed for fuelling this rage. If only Israel would achieve a just settlement with the Palestinians, and if only the United States would stop supporting Israeli intransigence, this common (and spurious) argument goes, the Arab/Muslim world would be greatly mollified and pacified. Nonsense, says Rubin. The Arabs cannot continue to blame the United States and Israel for their own failures to reform. "It is the systematically exploited hatred of the West in general, and of Israel and the United States in particular, that is the most effective tool of the Arab regimes and their Islamist opponents."

Rubin correctly argues that as long as the Palestinians and the broader Arab world have Israel and the Israel-U.S. alliance to blame for their problems (and as long as European hypocrisy feeds off this to deflect the rage of its own Arab-Muslim populations), Arab states have a convenient excuse for avoiding liberalization and modernization.

While both Rubin and Friedman agree on the urgency for reform, Rubin is more forthright in placing the onus on the Arabs. The United States and – especially – Europe can help, but only to a degree. Real reform must happen within the Arab states themselves.

The western media could help explain the conditions working for and against real reform in the Arab world by paying more attention to the social, cultural and economic environment in countries such as Egypt, Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia. Far too much of the region has been hidden from view. It's time to change that.

Asper Campus launches capital campaign

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Asper Jewish Community Campus, the crown jewel of Winnipeg's Jewish community, has officially kicked off a $7.5-million "Building On Success" capital campaign.

"Our goal is to enhance the facility and solidify its long-term financial viability," said Jeff Rabb, campaign co-chair, in officially launching the campaign on Jan. 21 in the foyer of the campus' Berney Theatre.

Rabb, a Winnipeg-based property developer, compared the campus to any other home that needs upgrading every few years, and noted that its Rady Jewish Community Centre membership has grown to double what was originally estimated when the campus opened in 1997.

Rabb said almost 2,500 people, excluding students and staff of Gray Academy – the on-site Jewish day and high school – visit the campus each day.

He said the purpose of the campaign is threefold. The first priority is to pay off a lingering $2-million debt left by an inability to sell the old Y building downtown.

Another $2 million is needed to "enhance the facilities to optimize their usage." Plans call for a new exercise area on the second level in space currently occupied by a student lounge, Rady JCC offices and the upper level of the racquetball courts.

Plans also call for a new pre-school room, more locker space and shower stalls and an expanded steam room in the Rady JCC men's locker room. As well, a renovation will yield two new meeting rooms, a doubling of the space of the Aleph Bet Child Life Enrichment day-care program, and a reconfiguration of the Gray Academy to maximize existing space.

The rest of the money raised will go to the centre's endowment fund to help offset ongoing operating costs. (Rabb noted, for example, that heating costs for the campus doubled last year).

Rabb's campaign co-chair, Marsha Cowan, a garment industry leader who is a past president of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and a former co-chair of the Combined Jewish Appeal campaign, introduced the high-profile campaign cabinet, most of whom are business as well as community leaders.

Rabb said organizers put off the official launch of the campaign until last month so as not to interfere with the annual Federation/CJA drive.

He said $1,411,000 has already been pledged to the campus effort, and he and Cowan are confident their campaign goal will be reached, and even exceeded. A public meeting has been scheduled for June 24 to report on fundraising progress.

Birthright Israel slashes summer program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The future of Birthright Israel – hailed as a revolutionary way to strengthen Jewish identity among Diaspora youths – is uncertain as funding problems are leading officials to slash the number of participants on this year's summer trips.

But organizers are determined to keep the program running.

"We're still strongly committed to it," said Maxyne Finkelstein, executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada, the main funder for Birthright in this country. "It's been an amazing success, and everyone wants it to continue."

This winter, Birthright took more than 10,000 youths to Israel – including 8,000 from North America, of whom approximately 1,000 were from Canada – but had to turn away several thousand people who were eligible, program officials say.

About 3,500 – all but 500 of whom are from North America – will go on trips this summer. It's all "we can manage in light of all the uncertainties," said Michael Steinhardt, a key Birthright Israel benefactor.

Now in the last of its five pilot years, the free trip to Israel for 18-to 26-year olds has taken about 60,000 Diaspora youths to the Jewish state.

Ironically, the move to limit participation comes as increasing numbers of youth, including those in North America, are expressing interest in visiting Israel.

Steinhardt said, "We hold out as a serious option closing down the program."

Program's future uncertain

Finkelstein said the Canadian federations, through UIAFC, provide $800,000 (US or $1.06 million Cdn) a year for the program.

If it does close down, UIAFC is looking for a "made-in-Canada solution" independent of Birthright Israel and on a smaller scale.

"It would require us to have a substantial pool of funds available," Finkelstein said.

When the program began, worldwide Jewish federations, mainly from North America, the Israeli government and a group of 14 philanthropists agreed to evenly divide the costs. But some of those sponsors have fallen short on their responsibilities for funding the $210 million (US), five-year program, which costs $2,400 (US) per participant.

While each party was originally slated to contribute $70 million (US) for the first five years, the Israeli government severely cut its funding this year due to budget cuts.

And the North American federation system now plans to pay only $35 million (US), of which it is currently short $4 to $5 million. As a result, United Jewish Community's overseas partner, the Jewish Agency for Israel, has increased its contribution.

The philanthropists have "carried the deficit," according to Marlene Post, chair of Birthright Israel USA.

For many of Birthright Israel's advocates, Israel's stance on the program is frustrating.

While they recognize the hardship endured by Israel's economy, stymying Birthright is like biting the hand that feeds it, they say.

Apart from immediately helping to fuel Israel's tourism industry, "these are people who could come back their whole lives," said Wayne Firestone, director of Hillel's Center for Israel Affairs.

But despite "budget distress," Israel donated a symbolic level of funding – about $450,000 – to express its appreciation for the program, said a spokesperson for Benjamin Netanyahu, whose finance ministry puts together the budget. Israel also committed to restore full funding in 2005.

Although Israel has phased out its funding, it "doesn't mean that they don't recognize the importance of the project," and "it doesn't mean that next year they will cut the budget also," the spokesperson said.

Meanwhile, Steinhardt sums up the scenario like this: some progress in shoring up funds from the federations, a commitment by a "fair number of the philanthropists" to continue funding the program, but no assurances from Israel.

"We are going to look at the program in the spring of this year and decide where we go," he said.

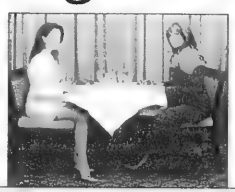
Why some keep weight off and others don't

Two women met recently for lunch. Both were happily married. Both had two children. Both were committed to being slim and attractive.

The similarity ends there. One was still fighting the battle of the bulge. The other had lost 50 pounds and easily kept it off for over two years.

Two women, one goal. Mary is a confirmed dieter. You name the diet, she's done it. The high protein diet. The TV dinner diet. Counting points. Weekly support meetings. None of this made her cravings for sweets and chocolate go away. She was usually hungry, dreaded weigh-ins, and soon found herself skipping meetings.

Rita, like Mary, had tried everything. All the diets and the products on the infomercials, including the exercise machines touted by movie stars. She had even tried the national weight loss chains. She read a Positive Changes Hypnosis ad in the newspaper and decided to act.



After her first visit she noticed changes in the way she ate. Her cravings were gone. Her nocturnal noshing habit disappeared — effortlessly.

Rita has kept her weight off for two years without dieting. She eats normally and no longer feels guilty when she goes out to eat.

What made the difference? Both women had knowledge, desire and motivation. Both wanted to be healthy and attractive. The difference lies in changing the behaviours that caused the weight gain in the first place. If you only deal with the symptoms of weight gain, you will never cure it.

If the diets haven't worked before, chances are they never will. Over 98% of all dieters regain the weight they lose while dieting.

Why the diet industry
WANTS YOU TO FAIL

They know that their products don't work long term and that you will line up to buy the next diet.

The largest chain of national weight loss centres does over 75% of its direct mail business to former members who have been through their program two or three times. These people have put all the weight they lost back on — plus a little extra. They can be sold again and again.

A program unlike any other. The whole purpose of the Positive Changes Hypnosis program is to give you emotional control around food so that you make better choices — automatically. Without diets or strenuous exercise.

What REALLY made the difference? Rita and Mary are both competent and sincere, just like you. One lost weight and kept it off. The other didn't. What made the difference?

Mary read an article like this one, thought about it and for whatever reason, didn't take action. She's still "thinking about it."

Rita valued herself highly enough to take action immediately. She was worth it.

You're worth it too. Call Positive Changes today and schedule your FREE weight loss consultation.

Toronto based food entrepeneurs help spark Israel's economy.

Sobey's at Clark and Hilda and its manager lead the way

Israel's economy has suffered severely during the last few years; the continuing intifadah has crippled Israeli tourism and caused the rise in numbers of disabled war and terror victims. Many companies are downsizing and reluctantly laying off employees due to lower demand for consumer products.

The government of Israel, to help overcome this desperate situation, has launched through its export institute a massive campaign called "Fine Food From Israel", appealing to North American Jewish Consumers to boost Israel's economy by buying Israeli products.

Yael Soglowek-Ender is a partner and shareholder of Soglowek Food Industries in Israel, and CEO of Zoglos Vegetarian Choice, the North American branch of Soglowek Ltd. Her husband Henry Ender is CEO of Foodfest International, fastest growing distributor and manufacturer of kosher food products in Canada. The Enders are both very involved in the importation of food products from Israel to the North American market. They have decided to rise to the occasion and do something to help Israel.

Israel needs your support

Yael's long time involvement with Beit Halochem - aid to disabled war veterans and victims of terror attacks - gave both an idea: helping the economy in Israel by promoting Israeli products, and pledging 1% of all sales of these products to Beit Halochem Canada. In this way, they are helping to raise funds to rehabilitate war and terror attacked disabled victims.

In their quest to launch their campaign the Enders are attempting to contact all the food stores in the Jewish community and ask them to participate by carrying a larger variety of Israeli products and promoting the campaign.

The first one to answer their call and and significantly increase the variety of Israeli products was Mr. Kevin Hopps, Manager of Sobey's at Clark and Hilda.

Mr. Hopps has a good understanding of the needs of his Jewish clientele and their strong affiliation to Israel. In his store, one can find the most extensive variety of fine foods from Israel at great prices.

The participating companies in the Enders' Campaign are: Zoglos Vegetarian Choice - soy, tofu and bourekas line; Zoglos Yael's Choice - cakes and pickles; Shamir/Zoglos salads, Elite - Famous line of coffee, chocolates, cakes, wafers, gums and soup mandel; Efrat - grape juice; Prigat - Famous natural juices, drinks and snacks, Jaffa juices; Ma'adanei Teiman - cigars, pastels and egg rolls; Telmas - Knorr soups, Richon matzoh products and pretzels; Einat soup and salad croutons; Rivit - natural snow sugarless snacks; Hanamal - marshmallows; Mottola - olives and Prichen pickles.

Henry and Yael invite anybody who imports Israeli goods to join this effort and call on the Jewish families in Canada to seek out and buy Israeli products even if they cost slightly more.

Israel needs your support!

Comedy is Alive & Well

Senior lives life with laughter at the Bernard Betel Centre

Not everyone could pull off a solo skit called "Sex and the Single Senior." But according to Reta Duenisch-Turner, being older means less inhibition. "I don't care; I've got nothing to lose," she laughs. But her humour wouldn't have blossomed without the free monthly "Nafty" Naftolin Komedy Kabaret at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living.

The first time she performed there, two teenagers "came up and said, 'you were really good – wow.'" Reta's pleased at the universal appeal of her humour, which has since taken her to Yuk Yuk's and beyond.

As an advocate for seniors and disabilities, Reta sees every spotlight as an opportunity. One young girl even told her, "We thought you'd be a bunch of old boring people, but you're not."

Reta is anything but, as she examines the perils of senior dating, starting with a personal ad: "Short, fat, funny senior lady seeking senior gentleman young at heart; willing to take long rides on WheelTrans."

Her anecdotes are partly based on personal experience, such as the man who "wants me to come to his apartment, then talks about how dark it is." When she asks, "Well, why don't you open the drapes?" he says there's too much sunshine. "That's all I need," she quips. "The dork of darkness."

Reta's humour often revolves around sexuality, like an advertisement she saw claiming that one-third of all men experience performance problems. "So where are the other two?"

At the Betel Centre, Reta also volunteers as Chair of the Social Action Committee and in other areas. She co-wrote a play with students about elder abuse, which has helped raise awareness.

But laughter is Reta's natural medium, and at the Betel Centre, laughter is more than just good medicine. It's a warm social afternoon in the coldest weather, a reason to have some fun.

The Komedy Kabaret was renamed after the late Morris "Nafty" Naftolin two years ago. His sister, member Shirley Gladstone, says, "In another life, he would have been a comedian." Missing his humour, the family thought financially supporting the Komedy Kabaret "was a good way to perpetuate his memory."

Staff member Ruth Cohen, who hosts the event each month, says anyone can take the mike. "People come to do jokes, or just to listen," she says. "Jokes let seniors laugh at their problems.

Like the three men walking in the desert. "The French man said, 'I'm thirsty; I must have wine.' The German says, 'I'm thirsty; I must have beer.' And the Jewish man says, 'I'm hot, I'm thirsty… I must have diabetes.'" "That's what humour is all about," Cohen says. "Looking at the funny side of things, you feel better." Or, as Reta puts it, "You've got to realize your body parts wear out. Some of them are replaceable – and some aren't."

The next Komedy Kabaret will be held on February 26 at 2:30 p.m. Admission free; light refreshments served.

U of T conference focuses on Mideast

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Nobody believed a student conference at the University of Toronto would bring peace to the Middle East.

However, Safiyyah Ally and James Sevitt from the Muslim-Arab-Jewish Dialogue group hoped that, at the very least, tension between Palestinian and Israeli supporters here could be redirected into more peaceful discussion by having people come together, listen to each other's stories and confront their own deeply held prejudices.

"Towards Peace and Reconciliation" was a day-long conference last week organized by U of T's Peace and Conflict Society. The event attracted about 100 people to hear panellists and to engage in workshops on such issues as Israel's security fence, anti-Semitism, suicide bombings and the Palestinian right of return. The day ended with a dinner and cultural celebration.

Canadians can bring their experiences living in a multicultural country to a situation where respect and empathy have broken down, said panellist moderator Prof. Margaret MacMillan, provost of U of T's Trinity College and author of Paris 1919.

Two of the organizers of last week's "Towards Peace and Reconciliation" conference at Uof T were James Sevitt and Safiyyah Ally.

MacMillan said dialogue is crucial not only for the Middle East, but for the sake of Canadian civil society and the preservation of free speech on Canadian campuses.

Pointing to the situations at Concordia and York universities, where discussion has been replaced by sloganeering, MacMillan stressed the importance of students not getting locked into inescapable positions where they feel obliged to take sides.

Dialogue needs to be developed around such issues as the Middle East conflict, "where both sides have their own tales of suffering and justification," MacMillan said.

Prof. Martin Lockshin, director of the centre for Jewish studies at York University, said he trusted that everyone at the conference believed a solution to the conflict is attainable.

"If you believe there is no solution, there is no need to ever talk to each other or compromise about anything," Lockshin said. However, he suggested certain rules be applied to discussions where people are "spilling out [their] hearts openly and hoping to touch each other's humanity."

For example, he said, avoid the "my pain is greater than your pain" and "my cause is more just than your cause" arguments.

Hussein Hamdani, chair of the Ihya Foundation, a non-profit Islamic educational group, talked about his experience as a Canadian student at Beir Zeit University in the West Bank.

After coming back to Canada, Hamdani said he used to give public talks about "Palestinian oppression" and the humiliation he experienced crossing checkpoints. However, he came to realize that he wasn't helping anyone by being "an agent of rage and anger."

Panellists Michelle Divon, an Israeli peace activist, and Mohammad Alatar, director of Palestinians for Peace and Democracy, spoke on addressing their pre-conceived feelings about "the enemy."

Divon, who is currently finishing high school in Ottawa, said that as an Israeli, she never had the opportunity to meet a Palestinian, an Arab or a Muslim.

For the sake of security, "I would turn a blind eye to the mistaken deaths on the other side and justify my country's own good intentions to protect its people," she said.

After living in Ottawa and becoming friends with a Jordanian girl and an Iranian girl, Divon said she discovered "that once you deal with people on a human level, the borders automatically break down and you're left with one shared message."

Alatar talked about coming to terms with his anti-Semitism and facing the reality of the Holocaust.

He said it took him two years to believe the Holocaust took place because he couldn't imagine that he had anything in common with his enemy or that "the suffering of the Jewish people was greater than my suffering.

"Sometimes to make peace with the other side, you have to go to war with yourself," Alatar said.

Finding the extra spark to help others

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It always amazes me that even when people are going through the most terrible things, they can still find the extra spark to help others.

One such person was Luba Tryszynska. Wtiting under her married name, Luba Tryszynska-Frederick, she tells her story, together with Michelle McCann, in Luba: The Angel of Bergen-Belsen, (Tricycle Press, 2003).

Luba was a young woman with a husband a small child, during World War II. When the Nazis came to her town, they took the family to Bergen-Belsen, a concentration camp in Germany. Her husband and son were taken away from her, and she never saw them again.

You can imagine how sad and scared she must have been.

On her first night at Bergen-Belsen, she heard children's voices calling "Mama." At first, she thought she was dreaming of her lost son, but finally she realized that she was actually hearing something.

She went outside behind the barracks, and she was shocked to find 54 children, alone, hungry, cold and scared.

These children were called the Diamond Children, since their fathers, diamond workers in Amsterdam, had been brought to the camp to help the German war effort.

Luba brought the children inside the barracks. Some of the other women were afraid, realizing that if they were caught helping these children, they could very well be killed themselves. However, they finally helped her keep them hidden and safe.

Since Luba was a nurse, she had more freedom than the others to move around the camp, and she was able to sneak extra food for the children and even clothes and medicine.

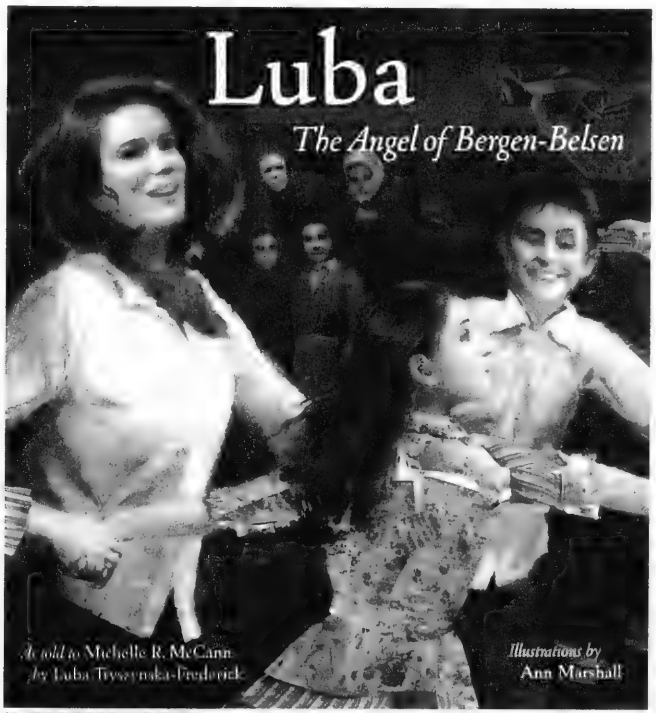
Luba had accomplished a miracle

The women tried to keep the children as clean and healthy as they could. They also told them stories and played games with them.

The children realized how brave and kind Luba was being to them. For her birthday, they made her a party, complete with little presents they had made themselves. One little girl tore a piece of red cloth from her dress, and made Luba a scarf. For the rest of the book, every picture has her wearing that scarf.

By the end of the war, though, no matter how Luba tried, things got worse and worse. The children became sick, and there were no medicines and very little food. She was afraid they would die.

Luckily, just before she gave up hope, the British army came and freed all the prisoners.



Luba had accomplished a miracle. Out of the 54 children that she found behind the barracks, she managed to save 52.

After the war, the children were scattered around the world. Luba, who never found her husband and child, finally came to Canada, married again and had two children. But the children never forgot her, and 50 years after the war, they had a reunion. They brought Luba to Holland, where she was honoured by the children and the Dutch people, and given a medal by Queen Beatrix.

People often asked her why she had risked so much for children who were strangers to her. She always said, "They may not be my children, but they are somebody's children."

Snow Day

"It's snowing!"

"Look how deep it is! They're gonna cancel school for sure!"

Michael and Tamara waited excitedly as Mom dialed the snow line. "You're right," she said. "School's cancelled today."

"YIPPIE!!"

"After breakfast we can shovel walks and make tons of money!" laughed Michael.

"We'll be able to buy that scooter we've been wanting to get!" added Tamara.

"Terrific," said Mom, "but be back by 4 o'clock."

"Who should we start with?"

"How about old Mrs. Greenstein?" suggested Tamara.

"Are you crazy?" shot back Michael. "You think she'd pay us to shovel her walk? She eats kids for breakfast!"

"She does not! She's just been a little grouchy ever since her husband died!"

"Well, no matter what, there's no way in the world she'll pay us for shovelling. Forget about it!"

"Fine. So let's ask the Strums."

Michael rapped on the Strums' door. "Good morning, Michael! Good morning, Tamara!" exclaimed Mrs. Strum. "Wow, it's still snowing!"

"Could we shovel your walk?"

"Only $10!" piped in Tamara.

"Oh absolutely. Thank you so much for doing such a big mitzvah!"

"Why is it a mitzvah if we're getting paid to do it?" asked Tamara.

"If you're only doing it for the money, then maybe it's not a mitzvah. But if you also keep in mind that you're helping us out, why isn't that a mitzvah?"

"Oh," said Tamara. "I never thought of that."

And Michael and Tamara began shovelling the snow away from the Strums' walk.

Seven houses and six hours later...

"I'm exhausted," moaned Tamara, lying down in the snow. "Is it 4 o'clock yet?"

"We still have a half-hour," answered Michael, "but let's go home anyway. We already have enough for a scooter, and I'm pooped."

The two of them slowly picked themselves up and trudged through the snowdrifts, dragging their snow shovels behind them.

"Michael," said Tamara. "We've made so much money today. Maybe we should shovel a walk for free."

"Who... who do you have in mind?"

"Uh... Mrs. Greenstein."

"She'll probably kill us for just walking into her yard!"

"Michael, don't you feel bad for her? She lives all by herself, her children never come to see her. Gosh, if I were her, I'd probably be a little crazy too."

Michael was about to tell Tamara that she already was, but then he reconsidered. "All right. Fine. But let's do this quickly."

The two of them began shovelling. It wasn't as easy as the other walks they had done. Maybe because they weren't getting paid. Maybe because it was the eighth walk they were shovelling that day. Maybe because there was more work to do. It was a very long walkway, passing between some gnarled trees as it rose to the front of the house. The house looked as if it was in bad shape, as if no one was taking care of it. The wind grew chillier as they approached the heavy, wooden doors.

"Michael," whispered Tamara. "It's getting dark. Let's get out of here."

"C'mon, we're almost done," responded Michael. "You're not scared, are you?"

Tamara jumped. "What's that noise?"

Michael froze for a minute. "Nothing... it's nothing. Look, this will only take another five minutes."

"WHAT ARE YOU DOING HERE?" bellowed a furious voice they knew all too well. Mrs. Greenstein loomed menacingly in the doorway, brandishing a broom. Her eyes flashed fire, and she seemed to fill the doorframe. Tamara and Michael dropped their shovels, riveted in place. "GET OFF MY PROPERTY NOW!" roared Mrs. Greenstein, and Michael and Tamara didn't need a second invitation. They bolted, her harsh voice echoing after them. "AND IF YOU DO SO MUCH AS COME NEAR MY HOUSE AGAIN, I'LL CALL THE POLICE!"

"I'm very disappointed with both of you. You were supposed to be home a half-hour ago. And where are your snow shovels?"

"Oh no! We forgot our shovels!" burst out Tamara, starting to cry. "We were just trying to do a mitzvah, but..."

"Well, come in, and then you can explain yourselves," said Mom, a little bit more gently.

Soon they were warmed up and sitting around the table. Dad, who had just come home from work, joined them.

"Well, first we..." started Michael, at the same time as Tamara sobbed, "We didn't mean to...," and the whole story tumbled out.

"...And we were so scared we forgot to bring back our snow shovels!" finished Tamara.

Dad thought for a minute. "You know, maybe she didn't realize that you were helping her out. Maybe she thought you were just there to cause trouble. You know the Torah story of Joseph and his brothers. They didn't get along with him, and thought he was out to get them. One day, the brothers were watching the family sheep, and Joseph's father sent him to go bring them food and see how they were doing. But the brothers thought he was coming to bother them. They threw him into a pit, and sold him to a passing caravan, while they ate the food he had brought for them…

"Eventually, Joseph rose to a very high position in Egypt, second only to the Pharaoh. He could have used his power to punish his brothers for what they did to him. But he didn't. He forgave them for their mistake. I know it's hard, but that's what you have to do too."

Michael and Tamara thought to themselves. Dad was right. Michael remembered what his sister had said about Mrs. Greenstein. He felt bad for her, living all by herself…

Dad smiled. "I'll tell you what. I'll go over to Mrs. Greenstein's now and get your shovels."

Dad put on his coat and opened the door. He stopped. The shovels lay at the foot of the steps. And next to them, in the glistening snow, was a note that simply said, "I'm sorry."

Special to The CJN

When my daughter was born, I walked the floors of our Atlanta home, night after night, day after day, holding her while she slept and when she cried, always stopping in front of the backyard windows framing a forest of trees.

As I grew into my unexpected role of single motherhood, I watched the bare trees bend, and sometimes break, under the weight of silver winter icicles. Then as if reborn, I saw the same trees stretch tall and proud with tight spring blossoms of white, pink and lavender, before expanding, under the summer rains, into a lush landscape of green. Finally, these magnificent trees transformed, as if to coloured music, into the passionate reds, singing oranges and dancing yellows of autumn, just as we packed our boxes and moved away to Portland.

In our cozy Portland apartment, my daughter and I often sat by a tall living room window looking at the plump round bushes bouncing under the rain and the rows of healthy trees hovering over the parking lot and filling the surrounding hills in a green mist.

Then we moved again. After exhausting, frenetic days of unpacking yet again – this time into an apartment in Los Angeles – I finally sat down at my desk, positioned in front of a window, to write. But all I could see were white stucco walls, black wires and, only if I leaned forward and looked up, the long, skinny necks of two distant palm trees. Right then I understood how profoundly trees define place. I prayed to find a way to embrace this one.

Tu b'Shvat, the New Year for Trees, emphasizes the nourishing, even spiritual, relationship between man and trees. "For a human is like the tree of the field," (Deuteronomy 20:19), the kabbalists believed. So besides the practice of donating money to plant much-needed trees in Israel, there is, according to Rabbi Joseph Telushkin in Jewish Literacy, the Tu b'Shvat seder. Started by Jewish mystics in the 16th century, Telushkin says some of the seder foods include olives, dates, grapes, figs, pomegranates, apples, walnuts, carob, pears and cherries.

The kabbalists believed eating a variety of tree-borne fruits during a seder ritual was a tangible way of improving our spiritual selves, so I decided to honour Tu b'Shvat by making a fruit and nut sauce I could eat every day.

I started by toasting some chopped walnuts and adding three different fruit juices. Then I cut up some plump medjool dates and added fresh cranberries. As I stirred the softening fruits over a flame, I recalled the urban shock I went into after our move to Los Angeles, and how on long walks with my daughter, I recovered my balance through observing the trees.

First, I discovered a tree leaning over our mailbox that grows tiny white peaches perfect for summer pies. And then, I noticed the just-above-head-height branches at the end of our walkway that dangled sun-glistened lemons close enough to touch. And each fall, as we passed the Japanese-style garden on the way to my daughter's school, I watched the green leaves of one sculptured tree open up to blossoming persimmons.

As the cranberry walnut date sauce thickened to a velvet red, I remembered the squished berries that used to stick to our shoes until my daughter and I learned which sidewalks to walk on, and which ones to avoid, when the trees in our neighbourhood dropped their inedible red fruits.

Unfortunately, I haven't learned to love the urban view from my Los Angeles apartment. But from my desk over the last five years, I have looked above the city walls at those skinny palms and watched them stand ghost-still against a summer cobalt sky, or tussle playfully in a spring breeze, or lean desperately, without breaking, in fierce winter winds. From those two trees, I have learned how, in a place that is not yet home, to be still, to play, and to bend, when necessary, without breaking.

CRANBERRY WALNUT DATE SAUCE

This sauce has a wonderful bright taste that I love with my bowl of fruit and yogurt in the morning. Because of its full texture, it is also delicious as a spread on a thick slice of date nut bread. And the majestic red colour and sweet aroma of these cooked berries is guaranteed to make you grateful for fruit bearing trees every time you make it.

- ½ cup walnuts, chopped
- ½ cup orange juice
- ¼ cup unsweetened pineapple juice
- ½ cup unsweetened pineapple chunks, sliced small (from can)
- ¼ tsp. lemon juice, fresh
- ⅓ cup sugar
- ¼ cup dark brown sugar, packed
- ½ cup fresh medjool dates, chopped
- 3 cups fresh cranberries, rinsed well

In a medium saucepan over medium heat, stir walnuts constantly until aromatic and toasted, approximately 1-2 minutes. Add remaining ingredients to walnuts, stirring well. Cover and bring to a boil. Turn heat to low and simmer uncovered until most berries pop open and liquid thickens, approximately 20 to 30 minutes. Make sure and stir every few minutes and if necessary add ½ cup of water to keep ingredients moist but not watery. Sauce thickens as it cools.

Transfer to medium bowl to cool. Refrigerate until use. Serves: 2½ cups.

Serving Suggestions: As a side to meats, a sauce for yogurts or a quick spread on breads.

More than 30 countries oppose Hague fence hearing

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — More than 30 nations have supported Israel's claim that the International Court of Justice (ICJ) does not have the authority to issue a ruling on the legality of the West Bank separation fence.

The 15 member states of the European Union and 10 members-in-waiting, as well as the United States, Canada, Australia, Russia, South Africa and Senegal joined Israel in submitting affidavits to the ICJ opposing the hearing. Several EU countries, including Germany, France and the United Kingdom, submitted their own separate affidavits to the court.

The court, the highest judicial body of the United Nations, took on the case last fall at the request of the General Assembly. Its ruling on the fence's legality is nonbinding, but both sides are aware that the outcome is likely to influence international opinion.

Most of the countries who have called into question the authority of the court have also voiced concerns about the route of the fence where it strays from the Green Line into the West Bank.

"Our concerns relate to the role of the court, not the legality of the route of the fence. It remains our view that the building of the fence on Palestinian land is unlawful," the British Foreign Office said.

Israeli officials said they were pleased that most of the world's important democracies shared Israel's stand against the authority of the international court, despite the dispute over the fence route.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) said in a press release Friday it welcomes the Canadian government's decision to oppose the ICJ's consideration of the anti-terror fence.

"While we recognize that Canada has reservations about a particular aspect of the fence, we note that, in principle, Canada appreciates the ongoing security threat facing Israel and Israel's obligation to address it…

"In addition, by voicing its opposition to the propriety of the world court's intervention concerning the fence, Canada joins with other countries which reject the exploitation and politicization of international institutions for partisan purposes.

"Israel's political dispute with the Palestinians can only be resolved through the process of direct, bilateral negotiations outlined in the international road map [peace plan]. This requires a demonstrable determination on the part of the Palestinian leadership to end terrorism and dismantle the terror groups, as the road map requires," CIC said.

In a statement Friday to the Hague-based court, which is due to convene Feb. 23 to discuss the issue, the United States also said the issue of the fence was a political dispute, and should be resolved through negotiations between the two sides.

The American comments reflect earlier statements by Jerusalem and others questioning of the authority of the court.

Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat called the international support for the Israeli position a "violation of international law," and Palestinian cabinet minister Saeb Erekat said he was angered by U.S. and British opposition to the world court hearing on the legality of the fence.

"I cannot understand it," Erekat told the Associated Press. "We seek to use diplomacy against the wall in going to the [United Nations] Security Council and the court of justice, and we find these countries, the U.S. and Britain, trying to shut the door in our faces."

Despite the opposition, there is only a slight chance the court hearing will be cancelled at this stage, Israeli Foreign Ministry legal advisor Alan Baker said Sunday.

Officials at the United Nations indicated Friday that they cannot ignore international objections regarding the ICJ's authority, and said that the hearing itself was in doubt. But Baker said this does not necessarily mean the hearing will be called off at this stage.

"The chances [of cancellation] are very slight," he said. "Maybe at the end. We have to go through the whole process."

Arafat said Sunday Israel would have to co-operate with the court.

"They can't stop it… They are trying to put all the obstacles in front of this court, but not to forget this is a United Nations resolution and they have to carry on with it," Arafat told reporters after attending prayers for the Eid al-Adha festival in a mosque in Ramallah.

The PA said Saturday it had submitted a formal affidavit to the court supporting its right to rule on the security fence. Erekat said the court had "full jurisdiction" and that the Palestinian position was submitted on Thursday based on how the barrier, which cuts deep into Palestinian land, affected the Palestinians' daily lives.

But Israeli officials said last Thursday's suicide bombing in Jerusalem highlighted their argument that the fence is necessary.

"We want to give people the possibility to see for themselves, especially when Israel as the victim is being put on the defendant's bench in The Hague… why we need the fence," said Foreign Ministry spokesperson Jonathan Peled.

Sharon orders plan to evacuate 17 Gaza settlements

By YOEL MARCUS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon says he gave orders to plan for the removal of 17 settlements in the Gaza Strip.

In an interview with Ha'aretz columnist Yoel Marcus, Sharon said, "It is my intention to carry out an evacuation – sorry, a relocation – of settlements that cause us problems and of places that we will not hold onto anyway in a final [peace plan], like the Gaza settlements."

Sharon, who informed the Likud faction of the plan at a closed-doors meeting Monday, also mentioned the problematic nature of dismantling communities in Gaza.

"We are talking of a population of 7,500 people. It's not a simple matter. We are talking of thousands of square kilometres of hothouses, factories and packing plants. People there who are third generation.

"The first thing is to ask their agreement, to reach an agreement with the residents. To move thousands of dunams of hothouses, educational institutions, thousands and thousands of vehicles, it's not a quick matter, especially if it's done under fire.

"I am working on the assumption that in the future there will be no Jews in Gaza," Sharon added.

Asked whether he intended to present his plan to U.S. President George W. Bush in a visit to Washington later this month, Sharon said: "Absolutely. It has to be done with American agreement and support. We need their support."

The prime minister said he had not yet discussed the issue of financing the relocation with the Americans.

"But we will have to discuss [it] with them."

Likud MK Yehiel Hazan, who was present at Monday's meeting, said the prime minister did not give a timetable.

"He didn't say it would happen at once," said Hazan. "He said it is possible there will be no more Jews in the Gaza Strip."

Sharon has previously said that if there is no progress in attempts to reach an agreement with the Palestinians, he will embark on a program of unilateral disengagement. Until now, he has been short on details, although he has said that the plan would require the relocation of some isolated communities.

There has also been speculation that the separation fence Israel is building inside the West Bank could serve as a border in the disengagement plan.

Israel releases alleged Canadian Hezbollah agent

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish organizations are reacting cautiously to the release by Israel last week of Fawzi Ayoub, an alleged Hezbollah operative who is a Canadian citizen.

But Stockwell Day, foreign affairs spokesperson for the Conservative Party, says the government "should make it clear he is not welcome back in Canada."

"He is a known member of one of the most vicious terrorist groups in the world," Day said. "I'm astounded that Foreign Affairs had an amicable discussion with him."

Last week, the Toronto Star quoted Foreign Affairs spokesperson Reynald Doiron as saying Canadian officials visited Ayoub in jail and that "Canada has exchanged information with Israel and we're hopeful he will be released shortly."

Day said he was puzzled by Dorion's statement: "It is absolutely the wrong signal to send to terrorists that Canada warmly welcomes them."

Doiron said that "each time a Canadian citizen is released, we're happy for him and his family."

Ayoub, 37, was one of 436 prisoners released by Israel in exchange for businessman Elchanan Tannenbaum and the bodies of three soldiers killed in October 2000 while on patrol in northern Israel.

Of Lebanese descent, Ayoub entered Canada in 1988 as a landed immigrant and later obtained citizenship. Media reports say Israel suspects he was recruited by the Canadian wing of Hezbollah while in this country.

Ayoub had been held in administrative detention since being captured in June 2002. Debka.com, an Israeli website about Mideast intelligence, says Ayoub is a Lebanese Hezbollah officer who was found when Israel raided the Palestinian police building in Hebron.

Debka alleges he is part of Hezbollah units in the West Bank there under a pact between Hezbollah and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat to provide weapons and train Palestinian Hezbollah operatives.

Doiron said Ayoub was transported on a German airliner to Beirut, where he was reunited with his family. He said Foreign Affairs had no information on whether Ayoub planned to return to Canada.

Canadian Jewish Congress President Keith Landy, said Canadian police and intelligence services should launch an investigation of Ayoub if he does return. "If he's Canadian and he has participated in activities that could be considered questionable in nature, I would urge the police to get whatever information they can and review the matter," he said.

Ed Morgan, Congress' Ontario regional chair, said the Criminal Code has been amended to give Canada jurisdiction over terrorist incidents. The law would apply even to acts committed outside the country, but it would not include events that took place prior to enactment of anti-terrorism amendments.

"I can just imagine Chezi riding the bus, talking on his cellphone, probably complaining to authorities that the regular service wasn't running on schedule," said his neighbour, Avraham Guttman, also formerly from Toronto.

"That's the way Chezi was," Guttman said in a phone interview. "Always doing, always arranging."

Last Friday afternoon, friends and relatives poured into the Thornhill home of Goldberg's brother Ronn to offer condolences, some still in shock. The family was busy preparing for Shabbat and making last minute arrangements to leave for Israel Saturday night.

Yechezkel was born Stuart Scott Goldberg in Toronto. He grew up in the Bathurst-Finch area, went to Jewish day schools, served for a short time in the Canadian Armed Forces and graduated from York University with a BA. He also studied at Columbia University, and while in New York, he met his wife Shifra Goldberg at a party for Orthodox singles.

"My brother used to joke and say that he was very considerate marrying Shifra because she didn't need to change her name," his sister Carrie Devorah said.

In describing her brother, she said, "Scottie took a while to find out who he was," but once he committed himself to working with children at risk "he did everything right."

Goldberg was a counsellor and certified alcohol and substance abuse professional for Orthodox teenagers. In his Jerusalem clinic, he dealt intensively with adolescents and families in crisis. He helped the homeless, the addicts, the depressed – young people who needed somewhere to turn.

Chezi and Shifra began their family in Brooklyn, N.Y., before moving to Israel 10 years ago. The couple and their seven children, now aged one to 16, lived in Betar Illit, a community near Bethlehem, of about 16,000, most of them observant.

"It was his dream to live in Israel, and his [late] father, Jack, encouraged him to pursue his dream," said his mother, Ruth, who wanted to explain what Chezi was really like.

"He was such a down to earth, sensitive guy. Teenagers could relate to and confide in him," his mother said.

In Israel, Goldberg wrote Lifeline, a column that appeared in The Jewish Press, an English language newspaper that primarily serves Orthodox readers. He authored several articles for the Jewish World Review and spoke often on the Arutz Sheva radio network. He dealt with issues not often discussed publicly. He wrote about religious male victims of sexual abuse and offered them ways to seek help. He taught parents how to develop lines of communication with their children when they seemed out of control and he stressed the importance of taking responsibility and not looking for others to blame when problem solving.

"There are so many problems in this world, and at the end of the day, we will never, ever get rid of them all," Goldberg wrote in one Lifeline column. "Problems are a part of life. I guess the question is, do we perceive ourselves as negative kvetches or positive solution seekers?"

In an article about Koby Mandell, a 13-year-old killed by terrorists two years ago near his home in Tekoah, Goldberg used Koby's parents as an example of strength. He also tried to comfort the Applebaums, another family affected by terror when David Applebaum was killed with his daughter, Nava, in a café in Jerusalem last year. He suggested the family read The Blessing of A Broken Heart, by Sherri Mandell, as a source for bereavement counselling.

Even while he encouraged the Applebaums to take control of their grief and continue with their lives, Goldberg's article revealed the anger, determination and despair Israelis face living in the midst of a daily conflict that seems never-ending.

His writing reflected the anguish faced by many families affected by terror. Ironically, the day Goldberg died, another Canadian, Ali Jaara, an accused Hezbollah training instructor, was being released as part of a prisoner exchange.

In the wake of the Mandell and Applebaum tragedies, he wrote that he couldn't help but wonder how families of terrorism victims could go on.

"[If] truth be told," Goldberg wrote, "the how question still screams out at me."

A trust fund, the Chezi Goldberg Memorial Fund, is being set up for the Goldberg family. For information, go to www.goldbergmemorial.org. Cheques can also be made to B'nai Brith Canada, with a notation that they are for the Chezi Goldberg Memorial Fund.

Goldberg is survived by his mother, Ruth; his wife Shifra and their children Chana Bracha, Esther Zahava, Yaakov Moshe, Yitzchak Shalom, Shoshana Malka, Eliezer Simcha and Tsvi Yehoshua; and brothers and sisters Chaim and Chavit Goldberg, Marla and Samuel Fidgor, Carrie Devorah, Ronn and Sara Goldberg and Nesya and Dovid Jacob.

CJA Federation opposes privatization of health care

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec should not allow any form of privatization of the health-care system, FEDERATION CJA told Finance Minister Yves Seguin at a public consultation on the government's upcoming 2004-2005 budget.

In its brief, the federation's social advocacy committee, chaired by David Birnbaum and Peter Jakobs, stresses the need to ensure the universality and accessibility of health care, as well as such other social programs as education, housing and day care. It deplores the long waits for surgery and physiotherapy, restrictions on the availability of home care and the "prohibitive" cost of drugs.

"As a result, the most poverty-stricken members of our society must often choose between food and medicine. Similarly, families are often compelled to assume the burden of home care, either entirely or in part."

It says the provincial drug insurance plan should be universal and prescriptions should be free for welfare recipients and for the elderly receiving the supplement to their old-age pension.

Poverty growing among Jews

The brief notes that 18.4 per cent of Montreal's approximately 93,000 Jews live below the poverty line, according to the 2001 census. Twenty-one per cent of the Jewish elderly and almost a third of single mothers are considered poor.

The federation says poverty is growing among Jews. In 1985, the rate was 15.5 per cent and 17.7 per cent in 1991.

To alleviate poverty, it suggests that Quebec institute a minimum income that would guarantee that everyone can afford basic needs, and it says the province should ensure that the price for essential goods is "reasonable."

The federation also supports an increase in the minimum wage and pay equity between men and women. Immigrants should not have to wait as long to be eligible for health care.

It calls for a revision of the income tax system in order to make it "more equitable and fair" and that it does not "favour the most privileged… at the expense of the most vulnerable."

This might be achieved, the federation suggests, by a "progressive rather than regressive" system of taxation. A sales tax is regressive, for instance, because even the poorest are forced to pay it. The federation also says single mothers should not be taxed for the support they receive from ex-husbands, and it would also like to see the expansion of public day care.

The brief also urges the construction of 8,000 social housing units a year, half of which would guarantee that tenants do not pay more than 25 per cent of their income for rent.

Although the Jewish and other communities and organizations provide a considerable array of social services, they must not replace what should be the government's role, the brief concludes.

"In the present context, the state's role has become more critical than ever. It must, therefore, assume its responsibilities and ensure that all citizens enjoy a decent quality of life."

Duplessis renounced anti-Semitism on eve of WWII, book reveals

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

When it became clear how serious a threat Nazi Germany posed, former Quebec premier Maurice Duplessis expressed regret for his previous anti-Semitism and fascist sympathies and wanted to make amends with the Jewish community, according to a new translation of a book by the late Israel Medres.

However, Duplessis believed that it was inevitable that Hitler would control Europe and thought it was futile to put up a fight.

Medres was a staff writer for the Keneder Adler, Montreal's daily Yiddish newspaper for more than 40 years, from 1922 until his death in 1964. He left behind a huge body of work chronicling the major events, both local and international, that shaped the Jewish community, and offers insight into reactions at the time.

Israel Medres shortly before his death in 1964.

A collection of his essays, originally published in 1964 under the title Tsvishn Tsvey Velt Milkhomes, has been translated into English by Vivian Felsen and published by Vehicule Press as Between the Wars: Canadian Jews in Transition.

Medres recounts Duplessis' apparent change of heart in a remarkable private exchange he had with him.

Medres was invited by the tyrannical Union Nationale (UN) leader to his office in 1938, just before a byelection campaign in the largely Jewish St. Louis district. Liberal Peter Bercovitch, the first Jew elected to the provincial legislature, had resigned to seek a federal seat.

Duplessis chose Louis Fitch, a Zionist and community leader, to be the UN's candidate. The community was divided over whether Fitch should have accepted the nomination, given the party's history of anti-Semitism. Likewise, many UN members demanded that Duplessis drop Fitch.

At their meeting, Duplessis presented Medres with a written statement, which Medres describes as "clarifying his position with regard to the Jews... in which he gave assurances that he was not an enemy of the Jews." Duplessis said he respected the community, and even had Jewish friends.

He wanted it published in the Adler, but first solicited Medres's opinion.

Taken aback, Medres replied that it didn't matter to him if Duplessis was friendly or not to the Jews.

"For me it is important to know if you are a supporter of the democratic constitution under which we live and find protection in Canada. If you are not a supporter of the constitution, then we cannot rely on you, even if you have Jews among your friends."

This remark sparked a conversation that would last more than an hour.

According to Medres, Duplessis told him he was not a supporter of Hitler or Mussolini, because their actions were contrary to the spirit of Catholicism, to which the premier said he was devoted. He also expressed compassion for the Jews, whose future he felt looked bleak.

However, he believed the Nazis would take over all of Europe, and perhaps beyond, and that it was impossible to stop them.

Although Medres completely disagreed with Duplessis and said so, the premier was firm in his conviction that time would prove his "objective and realistic" assessment to be right.

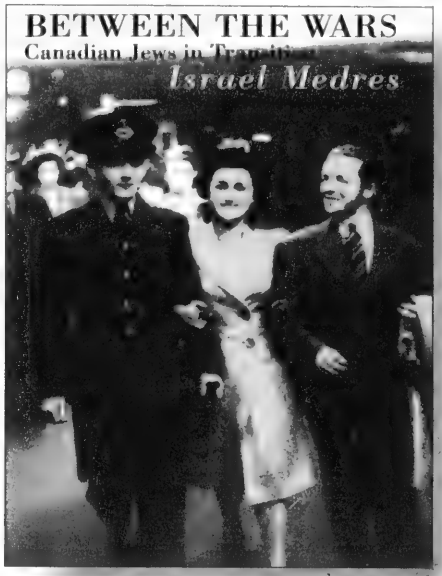
Medres gathered that Duplessis felt the democracies would have to adapt to this inevitability and find a way to coexist with fascism.

Perhaps because he was first and foremost a reporter, Medres does not indicate whether he felt Duplessis was sincere in his attempt to mend fences with the Jewish community, or whether he was merely politicking.

In another chapter, Medres writes about how a few years earlier, Duplessis had incited a campaign against the immigration of German Jews. Duplessis warned that 100,000 refugees were going to settle in Quebec on farms purchased by "world Jewry" and that this threatened French Quebecers.

He demanded that the federal government shut the doors to these Jews. Even though Ottawa made it clear it had no intention of allowing such an influx, a campaign to stop the immigration spread throughout the province.

"In the city halls of many of Quebec's towns and villages, motions were adopted demanding that the victims of Hitler not be allowed into Canada," Medres writes. "These motions sounded just like Nazi propaganda, referring to German Jews as anti-Christs and promoters of communism and atheism. The resolutions were often introduced by speakers who spewed fire and brimstone against Jews and justified their persecution at the hands of the Nazis."



Montreal was no exception, and Medres vividly describes a dramatic debate at city hall, with the three Jewish aldermen eloquently but vainly trying to stop a similar motion.

Fitch, who said he ran because he felt Duplessis was truly repentant, won the byelection. But in the provincial election of November 1939, Duplessis was defeated by the Liberals and Fitch lost to Liberal Maurice Hartt. It was the only election Duplessis would ever lose. He was re-elected in 1944 and remained in office until his death in 1959.

Elsewhere in the book, Medres' eyewitness reports on fascist rallies in Montreal and his coverage of the interns' strike at Notre Dame Hospital against the hiring of a Jewish doctor in the 1930s add to our understanding of this period.

Medres also wrote about those who spoke out against anti-Semitism, such as leading francophone intellectual Henri Bourassa.

He also brings to light a now-forgotten judgment by Superior Court justice Gonzalvez Desaulniers in 1935, which Medres describes as historic in its condemnation of anti-Semitism.

Although Desaulniers could not grant the injunction sought by a Jewish petitioner against the anti-Semitic publications Le Goglu and Le Miroir because there was nothing in the law that enabled him to, he issued a lengthy judgment expressing outrage against anti-Semites who claimed to be protecting the interests of French Canadians.

According to Medres, the judgment condemned these attacks as anti-Christian and immoral, based on falsehoods, demagogy and hypocrisy. He compared this anti-Jewish propaganda to that disseminated during the infamous Dreyfus case in France.

Above all, Desaulniers regretted that there was no law which existed to enable the courts to ban these publications.

Overall, the book is a valuable record of the transformation of Canadian, and particularly Montreal, Jewry from a predominantly Yiddish-speaking, working-class immigrant community into the English-speaking, mostly middle-class, community of the 1950s.

Native filmmaker wants to tell her survivor grandfather's story

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Jennifer Podemski is perhaps best known for her role as an aboriginal teen in the 1994 film Dance Me Outside and the CBC TV spinoff The Rez.

But these days, the award-winning native Canadian actress, producer and filmmaker is working on a family-related project about a different side of her identity.

Poignant short film climaxes with a visit to the concentration camp where Podemski's great-grandmother perished

Podemski, whose father was born in Israel and whose mother is from Saskatchewan's Saulteaux First Nation, is hoping to turn her short film about her paternal Jewish grandfather, Auschwitz survivor Joseph Podemski, into a longer piece.

The 11-minute documentary, which aired last fall on CBC News: Sunday, chronicles his trip last year to his hometown of Lodz, Poland. Jennifer and her two sisters Tamara and Sarah accompanied their grandfather as they tried to help him come to terms with his family's death in the Holocaust.

The poignant film climaxes with a visit to the concentration camp where Podemski's great-grandmother perished. In an emotional scene, the grandaughters watch their grandfather finally say goodbye to his beloved mother.

"For CBC Sunday, I was able to put together an 11-minute story, which I found to be the tip of the iceberg, so what I want to do is to make a one-hour documentary and really get inside the experience of my grandfather and the heads of his grandchildren," Podemski said.

"We need funding for it. It is hard to explain to people how important the story is, especially for the younger generation. I want to give a younger perspective on it. I feel youth don't really understand what our grandparents and great-grandparents went through."

Those interested in funding Podemski's documentary can contact her at jenski@bigsoul.net

Podemski and her family went on the trip as part of Hashomer Hatzair's involvement in last April's commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising. Podemski's grandfather, father and sisters belonged to the left-wing youth movement.

"It was always my grandfather's dream to bring us to the place he was born and to show us what happened in his life," Podemski said.

The trip took place around the time Saskatchewan native leader David Ahenakew told a reporter that Adolf Hitler was justified in trying to rid the world of Jews.

Jennifer Podemski is seeking to expand the documentary she made for CBC Sunday.

"CBC Sunday gave me a call and asked me to comment as a Jewish Native person. Through this, I now had a contact at CBC Television, so I took the opportunity to pitch my grandfather's story. They were very interested and I sold it to them – I was pretty determined to do it," said Podemski, who is also co-creator of the TV series Moccasin Flats, about life in Regina's native ghetto, which airs Monday evenings on APTN.

She said she went to Poland with open eyes.

"I knew we were going to concentration camps and learn about points of interest in Poland. I had no idea what to expect. It was really one of those things that you feel like a child again because everything is so brand new to you.

"The experience helped me understand and appreciate my grandfather, not that I didn't before. It strengthened my belief in family and I had a pretty strong family sense before that, but it blew up after that."

Hospital hews to the Hippocratic oath in treating Jews and Arabs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Since the onset of the Palestinian suicide bombing campaign in Israel and the territories, Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem has been on the front lines of caring for the victims of these attacks.

Hewing zealously to the Hippocratic oath, which commands physicians to administer impartial care to everyone, regardless of background or beliefs, Hadassah has been a ray of light in a dark landscape.

Ramon Gieling's film Welcome To Hadassah Hospital, which will be screened by Cinematheque on Tuesday, Feb. 10, at 8:45 p.m., explores its role in healing the wounded and the disfigured.

This revealing 50-minute documentary highlights the views of doctors, workers and one patient on this subject. Almost universally, they agree that the hospital has a duty, indeed an obligation, to offer equal treatment to all its patients.

"You can't bring your madness into this hospital," observes an administrator, succinctly summarizing the film's theme.

A doctor adds, "We're not bringing our ideas from home and the street, at least not yet, to the hospital."

Not everyone, of course, concurs with this humanistic perspective.

A patient, a Jewish woman who was hurt in the 2002 bombing of the Moment Café in Jerusalem, is clearly distressed by the presence of a suicide bomber in a nearby ward who was not killed when he detonated his deadly device.

> Hospital has a duty and an obligation to offer equal treatment to all its patients

"I wish I could choke them to death, but they won't let me," she says softly but emphatically.

In a more ambivalent vein, a Jewish doctor who thinks the injured deserve the best possible treatment adds that he would not hesitate to kill a suicide bomber on the cusp of setting off a bomb.

These harsh comments, however, are marginal in Welcome To Hadassah Hospital, which also profiles the hospital's Arab employees.

Among them is an Arab physiotherapist who treats a Jewish man and a kitchen worker of distant Jewish ancestry who once dated a Jewish woman.

Although Jews and Arabs work together harmoniously as a team at Hadassah, they are under no illusions about the incendiary political situation. In this spirit, a Palestinian woman notes that politics is not a topic of discussion in the workplace.

Nevertheless, a bombing does not drive the Jews and Arabs of Hadassah apart. As an administrator puts it, "We eat at the same table."

Incredibly enough, the hospital pays for the treatment of injured bombers, and doctors often become emotionally involved with them.

Gieling interviews one doctor who does not expect gratitude from Arabs. Another physician he talks to holds out the hope that Arabs will appreciate Hadassah's medical integrity.

Whatever the case, Hadassah should be commended for its unswerving dedication to the Hippocratic oath.

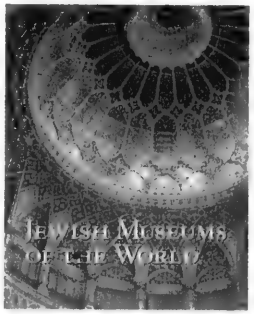
Jewish museums subject of exquisite coffee table book

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter



Jewish museums preserve and interpret the artifacts of Judaism and of Jews. They highlight Jewish history, culture and religion and promote a greater understanding of the traditions of a people.

And just as Jews are scattered throughout the Diaspora, so, too, are Jewish museums.

Jewish Museums of the World (Raincoast Books), a sumptuously illustrated large-format book by Judaica curator Grace Cohen Grossman, is a celebration of these glittering repositories.

Ranging far and wide, Grossman showcases museums from Canada and the United States to Israel and Germany.

Consisting of 415 pages and weighing several pounds, this is an exquisite coffee-table volume to peruse, read and cherish.

Grossman, a senior curator at the Skirball Cultural Center in Los Angeles, provides the text.

In addition to explaining the origins of Jewish museums – they evolved from private collections – she gives a reader a comprehensive account of each of the listed museums. (Some of the ones she lists are not specifically "Jewish.")

Her commentary is informative and erudite, as befits a person of such encyclopedic knowledge.

But it's the pictures – the 350 colour illustrations and black-and-white photographs – that are the real draw of this beautifully crafted book.

This reviewer was struck by the following illustrations:

• The 19th-century Bohemian wooden circumcision booth in Prague's Jewish Museum.

• The 18th-century chevrah kadishah jug in Bratislava's Museum of Jewish Culture in Slovakia.

• The 19th-century silver filigree spice container in Budapest's Jewish Museum.

• A 16th-century woolen Torah curtain in the Jewish Museum of Rome.

• A 19th-century Viennese Chanukah lamp in the Jewish Museum of Belgium.

• Two 18th-century porcelain figurines of Jewish peddlers in the Jewish Museum in London.

• A 19th-century Moroccan Elijah chair in the Casablanca Jewish Museum.

• Two 19th-century embossed silver Russian candlesticks in the Center for Jewish History in New York City.

• An acrylic on canvas of legendary American baseball player Hank Greenberg in the B'nai B'rith Klutznick National Jewish Museum in Washington, D.C.

•A 17th-century Italian ketubah in the Reuben & Helene Dennis Museum of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Jewish Museums of the World, complete with a directory and a bibliography, may well be the definitive book on the subject.

Yet, however sweeping in scope it may be, Jewish Museums of the World merely whets the appetite.

You'll have to visit some of these museums to truly appreciate their priceless array of Judaica treasures.

An off year for Jews at Oscars

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Jewish talent and themes scored only modestly in the Academy Award nominations announced last week.

However, there was recognition for the critically acclaimed House of Sand and Fog by Vadim Perelman, a 39-year-old native of Kiev, Ukraine, in his first feature film.

Although Perelman did not make it in the best director category, the film won three nominations: Ben Kingsley, who told JTA he had a Jewish grandparent on his mother's side, was nominated for best actor honors for his role as a proud Iranian immigrant.

Shohreh Aghdashloo, playing his wife, was nominated for best supporting actress, and James Horner was nominated for the musical score.

The documentary feature category, which has been traditionally hospitable to Jewish and Holocaust themes, includes two nominees with Jewish ties. Capturing the Friedmans tells the story of a highly dysfunctional Jewish family in New York, and My Architect chronicles the professional triumphs and unorthodox personal lifestyle of American architect Louis Kahn. It was created by his son Nathaniel Kahn and Susan R. Behr.

American Splendor, about cult comic-book author Harvey Pekar, who is Jewish, earned an adapted screenplay nomination for writers Robert Pulcini and Shari Springer Behr.

Among foreign-language films, neither Israel's Nina's Tragedies nor the Palestinian entry Divine Intervention made the cut.

Strangers, a seven-minute drama by Israelis Guy Nattiv and Erez Tadmor that was up for a nomination in the best short film category also did not make the cut.

The Oscars will be handed out Feb. 29.

Novelist Lilian Nattel takes rigorous approach to her craft

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canadian novelist Lilian Nattel leaves nothing to chance.

Her meticulous fealty to facts and her habit of revamping a manuscript until it is perfectly polished shine through her two historical novels – The River Midnight, which was published five years ago, and The Singing Fire, which hit bookstores late last month.

Nattel's painstaking attention to the minutiae of 19th-century Europe – her literary stomping ground – and her ruthless ability to prune have paid dividends.

Recognizing her rigorously professional approach to a demanding craft, and appreciating her mellifluous writing style, critics generally praised The River Midnight, which is set in a fictional shtetl in Russian-occupied Poland in the waning years of the 19th century.

Lilian Nattel

The River Midnight, her first novel, won the Beatrice and Martin Fischer Prize for Fiction and was translated into several languages, including German, Italian, Dutch and Hebrew.

And judging by Amazon.com sales figures, The River Midnight, which unfolds through the perspective of nine different characters, is still popular. "It has legs," said Nattel, a warm, sunny, cherubic person who speaks in perfect sentences. "It isn't a flash in the pan. It has made a living for me as a writer."

Buoyed by its critical and commercial success, Nattel wrote The Singing Fire (Alfred A. Knopf), which takes place in end-of-the-century London and, like The River Midnight, is suffused with a Jewish spirit.

In both novels, Nattel, a 47-year-old transplanted Montrealer who moved to Toronto in 1975 to attend York University, delves into her east European antecedents and explores an era that fascinates her.

A former chartered accountant, Nattel takes her work seriously. Before she sat down to write The River Midnight, which one critic likened to Gabriel Garcia Marquez's One Hundred Years of Solitude, she practically lived in libraries immersing herself in the vanished world of the shtetl.

When she had finished her research, Nattel was something of an authority on the subject, and this knowledge anchored The River Midnight.

She constantly rewrote, virtually discarding her first draft, throwing out much of the second and rewriting a quarter and 10 per cent of the third and fourth drafts.

Similarly, in The Singing Fire, whose protaganist is a young Jewish woman tricked into prostitution by a fellow Polish Jew, Nattel paid characteristic attention to detail.

With the assistance of a British relative, she toured the weathered Whitechapel district, where thousands of European Jewish immigrants landed virtually penniless.

And she read more than 100 books about 19th-century Britain, concentrating on topics ranging from Jewish life in London to the British economy.

"There is a huge volume of material available, and I made sure every detail – of dress, of street names, of food, of customs – was punctiliously grounded in research."

She began working on The Singing Fire in 1998, a year before she visited Poland, and in keeping with her general practice, she revised the novel.

Scrapping the first and second versions, Nattel finally hit her stride in the third rewrite.

"There was a kind of inevitability about it at this point," she explained. "The narrative flowed, the characters were real. Everything seemed to fit."

Yet she said The Singing Fire was harder to write than The River Midnight.

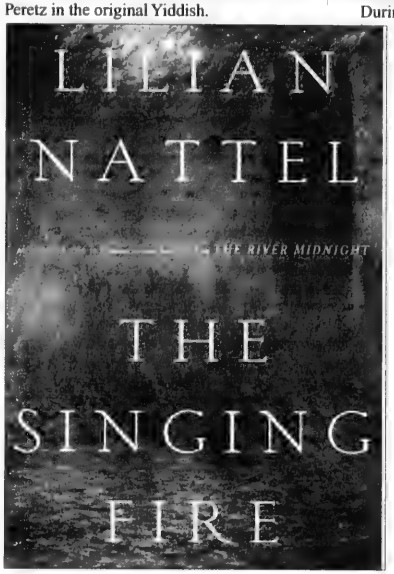
"I was just itching to write another book, revving to go, but it took time for the story to jell."

And she was dogged by the gnawing feeling that second novels are the real test of a writer. "You've done it once, but can you do it again?"

Nattel, a graduate of Montreal's Wagar High School, has been writing most of her life. At school, where she was known among her friends as an inveterate storyteller, she excelled in English composition.

At home, she devoured the books of I.L. Peretz in the original Yiddish.



She grew up in Cote St. Luc, a residential district favoured by immigrant Jews like her Polish-born parents, William and Julie, Holocaust survivors who raised three children.

Nattel left Montreal because she felt like a foreigner and was certain her future in Quebec would be limited.

She studied English literature at York University and published her first short story in its campus newspaper.

After earning a bachelor's degree, she found a dead-end secretarial job, but hated every minute of it. Unable to earn a decent living, she took a position in an accounting office. Then, through evening courses, she qualified as a chartered accountant.

"Life takes some funny detours," she said.

Much to her surprise, she enjoyed her new profession.

"It used other parts of my brain. It was an intellectual challenge. And I felt I was doing some good," said Nattel, who gave up accountancy six years ago but who still pays annual dues to the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Ontario.

During her 10-year interregnum as an accountant, she stopped writing altogether. Today, she compares this period to a desert.

Returning to writing in her early 30s, after finding her "voice" and acquiring sufficient self-confidence, Nattel began submitting short stories to Canadian and American literary journals.

At this juncture in her budding career, she had no wish to be pinned down as a "Jewish writer," a moniker the Shabbat-observant Nattel now gladly embraces.

Rejection was often her lot, but she persevered.

"Writing, for me, is such a significant part of being alive, and permeates all aspects of my life."

Nattel, who writes about 30 hours a week, was genuinely surprised by the success of The River Midnight.

"I thought it might get me a good vacation. I didn't think it would enable me to become a working writer."

Nattel, who has been influenced by the magical realism and the social commentary of Peretz, Sholom Aleichem and Isaac Bashevis Singer, is now hard at work on her third novel, set in the Soviet Union between the 1930s and 1940s.

Though reluctant to discuss her novel-in-progress, Nattel said that it is about romance, art and war, and that its narrator is an old Jewish woman recalling her youth.

Looking still further ahead, Nattel said her fourth novel will be "contemporary," and will unfold in the Toronto working-class neighbourhood in which she and her husband, social scientist Allan Greenbaum, live.

If writing is Nattel's greatest passion, her two adoptive daughters from China, Meira and Hadara, are her bundles of joy. As she put it: "My children are my treasure, and I love them more than life itself."

Lilian Nattel will be speaking at the Miles Nadal JCC "Bagels and Books" event on Sunday, Feb. 8 at 11 a.m.

French Jewish group losing control?

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Intercommunal strife is threatening the future of one of Europe's largest Jewish organizations.

Following months of political manoeuvres, anonymous letters and personal attacks, two senior members of the Paris Consistoire at the centre of the dispute have filed a legal request demanding that the courts place the organization under judicial administration.

That would remove financial control and administration from the community for only the second time in almost 200 years – an idea that Consistoire President Moise Cohen strongly condemned.

"It is unbelievable that two Jews, who are members of the Consistoire, are trying to destroy the community," Cohen told JTA. "The last time this was done was in 1940, during the Shoah."

Cohen's comment, a reference to the dissolution of the Consistoire by the collaborationist Vichy regime, follows the recourse to legal action brought by Consistoire General Secretary Maurice-Ruben Hayoun and Sammy Ghozlan, one of the organization's five vice-presidents.

Both men say that after a two-year struggle to change the way the Consistoire is run, they have no alternative.

To date, they have rejected calls from other Consistoire executive members to have the matter adjudicated by the Paris Beth Din or the Central Consistoire – both bodies that the pair say have an interest in backing Cohen.

According to Ghozlan, Cohen is guilty of "gross mismanagement" and of "not keeping the organization's expenses in check."

Cohen denied the charges, saying the Consistoire possessed "considerable resources," while its financial problems were short term.

"All Jewish organizations are feeling it at the moment," he said. "We have over 1,000 people working here. It only takes a drop in revenue of one-half of one per cent to make things difficult."

Both Ghozlan and Hayoun, a long-time opponent of Cohen on the Consistoire executive, have strongly criticized the fact that the Consistoire is paying for a car for Cohen.

Cohen is not paid, though the presidency is virtually a full-time job in an organization that runs more than 100 synagogues and employs around 1,000 people.

At the centre of recent developments is Cohen's attempt to force Ghozlan and Hayoun off the executive on the grounds that their official roles are incompatible with the public attacks they have levelled against the Consistoire in a series of open letters and articles on community websites.

On Jan. 20, Cohen asked the whole executive to resign so that a new board could be appointed. The manoeuvre was designed to force out Ghozlan and Hayoun, though they and three other members of the executive refused to hand in their resignations.

Lazare Kaplan, a senior member of the executive and a Cohen supporter, said the president had been left with little choice.

"These articles do great damage to the Consistoire," Kaplan said. "We told them, 'You are part of the executive. You either abide by majority decisions or you leave and become part of the opposition.' We have to get rid of them."

For his part, Ghozlan said he had tried over a long period to present criticisms internally.

"What am I supposed to do? Either I let these things pass and I'm an accomplice – in which case I'm letting down the people who elected me – or we do something about it," he said.

Created in 1808 by Napoleon Bonaparte, the Consistoire traditionally has held a virtual monopoly over the religious institutions of western Europe's largest Jewish community, with a vast administration that includes the Paris beit din, marriage and divorce registrars and a burial board.

It also generally has been recognized by the state as the official Jewish community organization in France – though since World War II a great part of its political role has been taken over by the CRIF secular umbrella organization of French Jews.

Nevertheless, as the most powerful influence in CRIF and by far the largest Jewish organization in France, the Consistoire remains important.

But in recent years, the Consistoire – which gets its money from donations, kashrut supervision and membership fees – has not been immune to the reductions in financial resources that have plagued many European Jewish organizations.

Cohen said the Consistoire "only exists through the generosity of its members," but that it now has to compete with other charities.

"We have the same problems as all Jewish organizations in France," Cohen said. "People raise money for Israel but they forget to give money to their own community."

Kaplan said Ghozlan's criticism of Cohen stems from other sources.

"He wants to run the community's security organization," Kaplan said, a reference to Ghozlan's Bureau for Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism, which the former police commissioner set up in opposition to the Jewish Community Protection Service, which is backed by both the Consistoire and CRIF.

Another source of tension, Kaplan said, is Ghozlan's advocacy of separate Jewish community councils for the Paris suburbs, which Cohen regards as duplicating or competing with the Consistoire's role. Ghozlan is president of the Seine Saint-Denis Council of Jewish Communities.

Kaplan admitted that the Consistoire "has serious financial problems," but insisted it was still solvent.

"We had problems with a reduction in meat sales with the fears over mad cow disease and, like other Jewish communities, we are facing increased competition from other kashrut boards," he said.

Kaplan said Cohen's supporters had offered to set up a three-man committee, which would include former French chief rabbi Rene-Samuel Sirat, to mediate the issue, but that Ghozlan and Hayoun had rejected the idea.

Ghozlan said he believed the court would likely appoint a mediator, perhaps a leading Jewish judge, rather than an administrator.

All sides now seem likely to accept such an outcome. But whatever the result, community leaders have been shocked by the recourse to legal action.

"This is terrible. The idea that someone who is not even Jewish could run the Consistoire is deeply damaging to the community," one senior community leader said.

Canadian finishes second in Orange Bowl tennis tourney

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

MIAMI — Sharon Fichman, Canada's most famous 13-year-old tennis player, almost made history again.

The Toronto athlete was attempting to become the first Canadian to win back-to-back titles at the prestigious Orange Bowl junior tennis tournament in Miami in December, but she lost the 14-and-under (14s) final in three sets, despite leading her opponent 4-2 in the third set.

Last year, Fichman won the Orange Bowl 12-and-under International Tennis Championship to become the first Canadian to win the tournament since Carling Bassett-Seguso in 1979. Bassett-Seguso went on to become Canada's best woman tennis player ever, ranked as high as eighth in the world in 1985.

Seeded 15th going into the tournament, Fichman looked like a 13-year-old version of tennis champion Justine Henin, winning her matches on hustle, will and drive.

Despite being shorter than her opponents (Fichman is 5-2), her speed overcame the power of six opponents, including upsets of the fourth and 13th seeds in straight sets. She never lost more than two games in a set.

But in the final, top seed Sorona Cirstea of Romania prevailed to win 6-4, 2-6, 6-4. Fichman dropped the first two games of the final set but rallied to win four straight for a 4-2 advantage.

At that point, Fichman had broken serve twice and seemed headed to victory. However, Cirstea reversed the flow in the next game, taking advantage of two Fichman double faults to break at love. With that, the momentum shifted for good as Fichman lost the next three games.

"I felt I let her back in a match I should have won," Fichman said. "I was disappointed to lose like this, with so many double faults, after coming back to take the lead in the third set."

"Sharon feels bad now, but she will realize that her runner-up finish was an outstanding achievement. Sharon is without question the best young tennis player in Canada today and came close to being the best in the world in her age group," said one of her coaches, Adrienne Simmonds, who travelled to the tournament with Fichman's father, Robert. Fichman's main coach is Ben Armstrong of the Mayfair West Racquet Club.

Sharon Fichman

"Sharon's close loss to the top seed will only add to her resolve to do better. She is stronger than she was last year and will only improve in the future," Simmonds added.

Comparisons to Bassett-Seguso are inevitable. Both are from Toronto, both achieved outstanding results at a young age, and they have similar styles. Both are short players who use speed and intelligence to win matches, rather than serve speed and raw power.

Bassett-Seguso won the Canadian 18s championships at age 14 and the Orange Bowl 18s at 15 before turning pro.

Last year, Fichman finished as a quarter-finalist in the Canadian 18s and her runner-up finish at the Orange Bowl 14s bodes well for her to possibly match Bassett-Seguso's feats over the next two years.

Whether Fichman next step is to turn pro or accept a tennis scholarship to a U.S. university is unclear. Her performance in the Orange Bowl tournament the past two years has her thinking about turning pro before 18. Other tennis greats such as Andre Agassi, Chris Evert and Monica Seles began thinking about turning pro after winning Orange Bowl titles.

"I think I would do well and hope to be in the top 50 in the world when I turn pro," said Fichman. "It is also possible that I would go to college at UCLA."

Her father said, "Sharon is in control of her life and I will always back her up. For me, I want her to be a well-rounded person with a balance [between] education and tennis. Let's see how she does in the next few years. I have never pushed her into tennis, or anything else. I would be just as happy if Sharon goes to UCLA, but she is in control of her future."

The grade 8 student at Forest Hill Public School trains three hours a day with coach Armstrong at the Mayfair Indoor Tennis Club in the winter and at the Toronto Lawn and Tennis Club during the summer. She has competed all in junior tournaments worldwide, proving dominant on grass, clay and indoor surfaces.

Fichman was born in Toronto two years after her parents immigrated to Canada from Israel in 1988. Her parents left Romania for Israel in 1983. "I wanted to leave the communist society in Romania and was fortunate to leave. My family and I left Israel because of the recession there," her father said.

Fichman started tennis at age 5 following her brother Thomas, who is a top Canadian player in the 14-and-under category.

She expects to represent Canada in upcoming international competitions, including the 2005 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Initiatives try to fight racism in European soccer

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — A celebrity soccer match may seem an odd way to commemorate the Holocaust. But in a country where militant soccer fans are infamous for using racist and anti-Semitic slurs against their opponents, the Match for Memory is seen as an important and high-profile means of fighting hate.

"It is a great event that can seize the attention of the younger generations," a spokesperson said.

Like a number of other European countries, Italy marked Tuesday, Jan. 27, as a national Holocaust Remembrance Day. The commemoration, now in its fourth year, includes scores of ceremonial, educational and cultural events in towns and cities up and down the peninsula.

Foremost among them this year is the Match for Memory – a soccer contest between two teams of VIPs held in Rome's Olympic Stadium. The game will be nationally broadcast live on prime-time television.

The match is sponsored by the Italian Jewish community with the backing of Rome's mayor and other government and political authorities, and the competing teams feature politicians, sportsmen, artists, entertainers and journalists.

Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel will be the guest of honour, with senior government officials also in the stands. In addition, organizers of the match said soccer players in professional league matches had agreed to take the field wearing signs on their uniform shirts advertising the Memory Match with the slogan, "So as not to forget."

Racism and anti-Semitism among soccer fans has long been a stubborn – and embarrassing – feature of soccer matches in a number of European countries.

"Unfortunately, at all levels of the game, from amateur to international, there are incidents of racism," said a statement from the group known as Football Against Racism in Europe. Black players often have been targets, with fans sometimes making "monkey noises" or throwing bananas onto the pitch when black players take the field.

Rival fans also often brand their opponents "Jews" who should be "sent to Auschwitz." About half of the cases of anti-Semitism reported in Holland in 2002, for example, were related to soccer games where fans unfurled anti-Semitic banners or shouted slogans such as "Hamas, Hamas, hang the Jews in the gas."

Governments, nonprofit groups and national and international soccer organizations, including Europe's governing soccer body, the Union of European Football Associations (UEFA), have attempted to crack down, with only limited success. The anti-racism group recently urged UEFA assistant referees at a seminar to monitor the grandstands for abuse.

"Racism is a social problem that spills over into football. You are in an ideal position to help UEFA in the process of dealing with this problem," Piara Powar of the anti-racism group told the assistants. "You are close to the fans on many occasions, and you'll sometimes hear remarks that are being made behind you. You can identify problems that perhaps a referee or match observer won't be able to see or understand."

In 2002, as part of an Action Week of Football Against Racism in Europe, a petition against racism in Polish soccer stadiums signed by 27,000 people was presented to the president of the Polish Football Association. It noted anti-Semitic abuse, neo-fascist symbols and frequent hostility to black players. Signatures were collected at stadiums and schools all over Poland by a group called Polish Humanitarian Action and the independent anti-racist association Never Again.

In Italy, where Jewish leaders have long pressed authorities for action, the interior and sports ministers ruled three years ago that matches could be halted if fans displayed racist banners.

This year's Match for Memory is not the first time Italian Jews have fought racism in the stadium itself. In a 2000 initiative called "I am not a racist," the Napoli junior soccer team cooperated with the Jewish community to erect four big anti-racist photographic panels outside the San Paolo stadium.

Working each day for social change

Five months into my year in the AVODAH Jewish Service Corps program, I would like to share with you more about our daily life here in New York City.

If you saw my earlier articles, you have already read about the "intentional" Jewish community that I am building with my nine housemates and another house of eight program participants. You have learned about the struggles involved in living with a group of Jews with different dietary, emotional, individual and communal needs. Now let me talk about the chief reason that we're all here.

By ELISHEVA GOULD

AVODAH participants, once accepted into the year-long program, had to choose – from a list of 18 non-profit organizations – three workplaces that most interested us. Then we each had to be interviewed and hired by one of those organizations. AVODAH is thus the umbrella organization that provides us with the programming and communal living structure, and the non-profit groups are our everyday workplaces for the year.

Some of my friends in the program work as case managers at domestic violence shelters. Others work at inner-city schools with "at risk" children and teenagers. Still others work for national organizations such as Jobs With Justice, which focus on community organizing, immigrants' rights and lobbying the government for policy changes.

My fellow Torontonian, Rachel Birenbaum, works at the Red Hook Community Justice Center, a short walk away from our house, in a troubled Brooklyn neighbourhood. She is a case manager who meets with people charged with misdemeanors such as drug possession, assesses her clients' needs, and when she can, refers clients to drug and alcohol treatment programs as an alternative to incarceration. Rachel's workplace productively addresses some of the root causes of such crimes and gives people second chances to straighten out their lives.

All our jobs are challenging and include front-line, anti-poverty, tikkun olam ideals. I knew that I wanted to work with a homeless demographic this year, as I have always yearned to do something proactive to help the homeless people I see on the streets of Toronto, New York and other cities. I always try to give them a couple of dollars, because I can only imagine how hungry they may be or how much money it takes to find a decent overnight shelter. But I've also wondered what more I could do to provide homeless and poor individuals with ongoing and more sustaining assistance.

This wish brought me to my job as a legal advocate at the Urban Justice Center (UJC), a non-profit organization that provides free legal advice, referrals, advocacy and representation to homeless, poor and marginally housed New Yorkers. The amazing thing about UJC is that, as its motto of "individual rights, social change" attests, it combines one-on-one legal advocacy with the goal of broad, systemic change. The attorneys on staff not only do the advocacy work that I do, but are also involved with affirmative litigation that helps change policies detrimental to the city's poor people.

I work in UJC's Homelessness Outreach and Prevention Project and my fellow AVODAHnik, Jenny, works in the Mental Health Project, which provides legal services for people who have psychiatric disorders. These are only two of the UJC's groundbreaking pro bono law projects. It is an exciting experience for me to work in an organization that is at the forefront of advocacy and social change for underrepresented people.

To fully describe the day-to-day work that I do through the Homelessness Outreach and Prevention Project requires a column unto itself! Next month, look for more on my work at the Urban Justice Center.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

I find myself writing on pluralism more and more these days. I recently attended a Shabbaton for March of the Living participants that turned out to be a model of pluralist education.

There is such loose use of this word that it might be useful to work toward some definition, and I find actual educational situations to be helpful in this regard. First, it is important to point out that pluralism is not necessarily a Jewish value. Our great-grandparents were mostly not pluralists. On the other hand, a properly articulated pluralism need not be antithetical to traditional Jewish values.

At the Shabbaton, I saw young people from a variety of schools – both public and Jewish – and from a fairly broad spectrum of religious affiliation (including youth with no identifiable affiliation) sharing a Shabbat of prayers, meals, classes and social gatherings. There were two rabbis in attendance, one Reform and one Orthodox. From them I saw not mere tolerance, but rather a deep respect for each other, without either feeling the need to make compromises. Both rabbis found a way to maintain their own values and still show respect for each other. This was noted by the participants, who practised what they believed while seeing the value in other approaches.

One form of pluralism requires that everything be reduced to the lowest common denominator so that no one is offended. I prefer the model that permits each stream to act according to the authenticity of its own ways, but provides for respect of other (even opposing) positions.
